SONGS WITHOUT WORDS.

WRITTEN FOR THE NEW YORK CLIPPER, BY E. NORMAN GUNNISON.

The robin sits within his leafy chamber,
Beyond my door,
And trills a song with mirthfulness and music
Which meets encore.

From her, his mate, who, resting in the shadow
Of the green shaven,
Returns his strain, vibrating through the senses
Of all the leaves.

"Chee! chee!" he sings. "Chee! chee!" she fondly answers.
O happy birds!
I vainly lean to catch your hidden meaning,
Songs without words.

Yet every note is love, God gave the language,
Ye speak it well.
How sweetly simple are the intonations
Which rise and swell

And vibrate in the Summer's breath, responsive
To nature's voice.
Down the long line of verdant forest arches.
Rejoice! Rejoice!

Rejoice with us! for Love has spread its mantle
On all the hills.
We hear the voices of the Summer calling
Along the rills.

And so, O robin, human hearts, responsive
Unto the birds,
Shall listen to the beauty of your music,
Songs without words.

CHAPTER XV.

RETURN OF THE EXILE.

Doyle was more horrified than Hope at what had happened. He was so stunned by the discovery, so tortured by his own accusing conscience in the face of his own guilt, that he could not answer Hope, and scarcely seemed to heed him.

"She is not dead, Eva, my poor child!" he burst forth in such a tone of agony and affright that Hope's anger for the moment faded, and he stood aside, while the doctor knelt and felt her feeble pulse.

"She lives," he said gladly. "Fetch her maid, sir, and let her be carried to her room." Hope dreaded a scene, and so quietly and swiftly brought Miss Falconcourt, told her what had happened, and for the sake of company suggested that Eva should be as quietly as possible be conveyed to her room.

"I will somehow manage to get the door closed, Hope, while you carry her up-stairs," answered Marian, who was dreadfully alarmed, and kissed Eva's pallid lips many times.

Hope took the helpless form in his arms and carried it up-stairs rapidly, so as to escape notice.

"You will attend her, Mr. Doyle," said Miss Falconcourt, looking down with a blush on her face.

Doyle was trembling from head to foot. How infinitely grateful he was that Miss Falconcourt did not look up at him! The shame of his own guilt held him mentally in bondage. How miserably mean he felt! He wished himself far away from her at that moment.

"There is no cause for alarm," he said; "merely a slight fainting fit, my dear Miss Falconcourt."

He then gave her a few hurried directions for the restoration of Eva's consciousness, and Marian at once followed Hope and summoned her own maid to attend. So quickly and quietly had the whole affair taken place that but few of the visitors knew it, and they kept discreetly out of the way. When Hope came down-stairs he found Doyle still in the room adjoining the conservatory.

"I am glad you are not gone," he said sternly; "I must tell you a bit of my mind, sir. You have acted the part of a coward and a liar, and but for the shame and humiliation to the aristocratic name of upon Miss Falconcourt, I would make you answer dearly for this. Had you had but honor and manliness enough to have written to Miss De Vere your intentions, and stated that you wished the engagement broken off, she would, I am sure, have readily consented."

"It is not your place to interfere in the matter at all, sir."

"As Miss De Vere's relative, it is my duty to see she is not fooled, insulted and cheated by any dishonorable scoundrel who chooses to sport with her feelings."

"Be careful, sir," said Doyle with a dark frown. He clenched his hands, and hissed the words out between his teeth.

Hope was fearless always, more fearless now that he was fighting the battle of right.

"I shall do and say what I please. I do not fear you, Mr. Doyle; and, as I said before, but for Miss Falconcourt, whom I am bound to respect in the matter, I would repeat what I have just said, word for word, in the presence of strangers and friends, the first time I met you in public. As it is, I shall be silent, but demand from you an explanation, which must be given to my cousin. Do not attempt to tamper with her again, or, by heavens, I shall forget myself, and there will be mischief done of it. Do not honor me with your conversation nor your presence more than you can help. I only regret that circumstances compel us to meet under the same roof."

Then he turned away, and Doyle darted after him a bitter look, made more threatening and ominous by that unpleasant smile which so often marred the beauty of his face. There was much bitterness in his soul as he drove home. There was more bitterness in his soul when the hours of leisure came, and his conscience haunted him with that scene at the Falconcourts'. If the truth were known there, he felt that he would lose the love of the one and be cast away by the other as a worthless and faithless liar. Was this to be the end of all his deeply-laid schemes? Would not Hope betray him?

"That plausible dependent, who is playing for the stakes himself," he mused mentally—"who, desiring that I would relieve him of his cousin, would marry Miss Falconcourt. Vain idiot!"

So far Doyle was terribly wrong in his calculations. Hope had never dreamt of associating his own future with that of Miss Falconcourt. But he had now become a hateful presence to Doyle—a dark, threatening spirit of enmity, which would haunt him, in every step, "unless," he muttered, "I remove it." In these matter-of-fact days people are easily removed; and Doyle, as a worldly cynic, knew it. Still his mind was at work—all the keener for being strengthened by revengeful passions.

Whether evil thoughts have any magnetic influence upon evil associates is a matter for discussion elsewhere; but, strangely enough, while Doyle was thus moodily seeking means to reach Hope, a servant announced Mr. Conyer Elston. The handsome and reckless adventurer sauntered into the room in his graceful, easy way, which was all his own, for in any other person it would have been pomposity.

"How do, Doyle? Why that frown? You are disturbed."

"Sit down, Elston," said Doyle, taking the proffered hand and giving it a hearty grip. "You are just the man I want to see and to help me."

"Tell me the trouble, my friend, and I will volunteer any assistance in my power."

"You shall hear. Let me ring for wine and cigars first."

"By all means," said Conyer, placidly stroking his long moustache, as Doyle rang the bell for attendance and waited for the coming of his servant, to whom he simply said: "Decanters and cigars."

Elston, to sailors, with that reserve concerning Christian names when the person addressed is not a bosom friend, "you have probably heard of my affair with Evelyn De Vere."

"I have heard," said Elston, helping himself to brandy and a cigar.

"From Plummer?" queried Doyle, following Elston's example.

"Yes," answered Elston with a shrug of his shoulders. "That coarse brute would blab the secrets of Masonry when in his cups. But I thought you had been playing for higher game."

"There lies the trouble. The fact is, whatever may be my sentiments concerning Miss De Vere, you know full well that, involved as I am, I cannot afford the luxury of a penniless wife."

"That is my case; but I interrupt you."

"Were I quite safe here, I might venture on a love match; but the fact is I am only Todd's assistant after all, and I fancy he has heard some spiteful reports concerning me. I had contemplated great expectations, but now I have foresight enough to know and see that he will supplant me with his nephew when that gentleman finishes his studies abroad. He is a man of some power already. Besides the uncertainly of my position, I do not like the profession."

"Men seldom do like the profession they are forced into."

"This profession above all. It is a sham, Elston. Two-thirds of the patients I have to attend have no ailments which require the assistance of a doctor, yet I have to play the hypocrite and medicine them with harmless concoctions of drugs, and drag through weary hours in the bedchambers of the maudlin old ladies and thankless old men."

"I can understand you objecting to that sort of thing. However, my dear Doyle, let us hear your trouble."

"You know, from conversation and hearsay, pretty well how things have been going with me," Doyle continued; and, as Elston gave a lazy nod of assent, he went on: "Miss Falconcourt and I went a little too far the other night. I declared my love and that sort of thing. She did not repulse me, but ——" And Doyle gave a short, angry and bitter laugh.

"We were seen by Miss De Vere and—curse him—Camden Hope, her cousin."

"Pleasant. Then followed a tableau, I suppose."

"Yes, a painful one; and before I left that sleek, dependent Hope had an interview—also painful. Unless he is removed from that house I shall find a dangerous rival."

"Remove him, my friend," said Elston, much in the same way as he would speak of removing a dog.

"But how? He is a fixture—called a man of honor, of spotless integrity, a man of conscience—a saint, in fact—only materialized."

"Rum in his character, my dear Doyle. He is young, probably believes the world all goodness and mankind like himself; no doubt chivalrous with women, therefore easily deceived."

"I have thought of that, but how is it to be done? I fancy I could trust Gabrielle Vane in this, but how am I to get them introduced?"

"I think I could manage that," said Elston slowly. "Thanks to you, I know Miss Vane a little, and I think I have some knowledge of Mr. Hope's family affairs which would make him a dear friend of mine. But remember, that lovely little queen of the stage is capricious."

"Elston," said Doyle, rising and striding the floor slowly, "Gabrielle Vane owes her debut on the stage to me. I have squandered a small fortune upon her. When I did it, I thought of making her my wife as an investment. If I have changed towards her, she has not towards me—in this one respect she is my slave."

"Many a dozen rich fools would give a year's income for a smile from her," said Elston. "Such is the way of the world."

"Gabrielle and I have a compact. She may smile, she may coquet as she does—for she is an actress off as well as on the stage—a reckless and apparently heartless beauty, who sports with the idiots who flock round her and worship her; and still there is, as yet, no man rich enough to buy her. Gabrielle is all passion—has a soul that can thrill with emotions—rare in a woman who can keep those very emotions and passions down, even with the very Goddess of Temptation before her."

"Do you think that will last?"

"Until she is disappointed in her love and her purpose. She may cease to be virtuous, then, but not for the sake of gold. She will find someone who adores her—someone who could be all her own without the power of money or title to make him independent of her. He will be her slave—a caressed and petted slave, but still a slave—when she ceases to be mine in will."

Conyer Elston would have sneered at any other man who spoke like this—who boasted a will that could conquer by master mind alone. But he knew that this was no idle boast of Ernest Clayford Doyle. He knew him to be a man far above the stamp of anything ordinary.

He was a man with a subtle brain, tempered by hard worldly experience, and a heart steeled by a total want of faith in mankind. A man with iron nerves backed by a powerful physique; in a word, scholar, cynic, skeptic.

"My dear fellow," said Elston, "if you can arrange your plans with mademoiselle I will undertake the rest. News has just reached me of the death of old Lord De Vere Hope, an eccentric old bachelor, and I believe Mr. Hope is the only, or at least the direct male heir—card one—an ace—first trick. I will communicate this intelligence to him—will help him hunt the matter up—will let him see that I was known to be his family and the De Veres—trace how I will casually introduce him to Miss Vane at my office. That is my last hand. She must play the rest, and the game is ours."

"You can do this?"

"With very little trouble, my dear fellow; and now I want you to see me to-morrow."

"For what?"

"I want some money to invest. Your interests are concerned as well as mine. Things are shaky before their time. When we can lay our hands upon the thousand pounds, the whole affair may totter to its foundation and bury whom it may beneath its ashes."

"Very well, Elston. But stay. Do not even hint to Gabrielle of my affair with Miss Falconcourt."

"You may rely on that. Now I'm off, and you ——"

"I am going to drive over to Gabrielle. I shall catch her before she leaves the theatre."

"Won't you dine with me to-night?"

"Juliet, I believe. Will you drive with me?"

"Thanks—my phaeton is at the door."

They drank to the success of their plans and parted, well matched in all things where sin was the ruling principle. Doyle ordered his carriage and prepared for his drive; but he drank deeply before the carriage started, and there was the old-time light—a dark, mysterious light—in his eyes when the servant appeared, bringing a tiny note on a silver salver.

The note was from Miss Falconcourt. It was written in her father's name, and simply said that "Dear papa had missed Mr. Doyle's company the last few days, and would Mr. Doyle honor them with his company at dinner to-night?"

"Then the suit is between me and Evelyn?" he muttered, with a glad flush upon his handsome face. "So much the better. But I cannot go to-night."

He made up his mind to leave his card and a message to that effect as he drove past. He ordered the coachman to drive to Mr. Falconcourt's.

"And make haste," he added.

When the coachman pulled up at the M. P.'s door, Doyle alighted from his carriage and made inquiries in person.

"Is Mr. Falconcourt in?" The answer was a negative. "Miss Falconcourt?" Same answer. Then, before he was aware of the impulse which flashed upon him, he added: "Miss De Vere?"

"Yes, sir."

"Take my card."

"Yes, sir." The flunkey hastened up-stairs with the card, and soon returned, saying that Miss De Vere would see him in a few minutes. Would he step in?

Mr. Doyle sat alone in the quiet reception-room, and the dusk of evening filled it with flitting shadows that played upon his handsome face, which was deadly pale and troubled in expression now. The few minutes seemed almost an hour, as he waited with a beating heart and almost suspended breath for Evelyn; and she came at last. Slender and graceful as a nymph—calm, proud, and with a face as pure and fair as a naiad's cut in crystal—her step was a little hasty, but her demeanor tranquil, and Doyle, with a burning blush of shame spreading over his countenance, rose to receive her. Tranquil! And he had not expected that of her, after all. How little he knew the strength of a woman's pride, and, above all others, of hers! She paused an instant before she reached him, her graceful head thrown back and a little on one side, surveying him softly out of her sad, dreamy eyes, her lips whitened a little. Then she went swiftly towards him, and held out her hand—her little, dainty hand—saying gravely:

"How do you do, Mr. Doyle? I did not expect this."

She looked him straight in the face with unwavering eyes, that faithfully kept out of their depths any hint of pain she might feel on her own part for the course she was taking. Then she asked, without any apparent constraint:

"Have you brought my letters?" at the same time producing those she had received from him.

"Are you prepared for this, Eva?"

"I think so, Mr. Doyle. It is best so."

Was there any tremulousness in that soft, low voice? Yes, for the shadow of a moment; but, as Doyle lifted his glance to her face, it was tranquil, gentle, but quite firm.

"Something has changed you. I did not expect this," he said.

There was some emotion flowing into her cheek and going again.

"It is not because I love any other," she said, with her white fingers interlaced, and looking away from him; "but we are better apart." She stopped, paused a moment, and she went on: "I should like to be free. This engagement has been bondage for me, and, I doubt not, for you," and then her eyes came tranquilly back to his face again.

Bondage! God forgive her, she called the engagement bondage!—she that had given kiss for kiss, and loved the traitor still. Doyle took the package of letters from the carpet where it had fallen.

"You are free," she said coldly.

"We shall be friends, shall we not, Eva?" His voice sounded scarcely natural.

"I shall want to see you sometimes and hear of you, and I hope you may be happy, Evelyn. I do hope you may."

He longed to say something, but felt stunned. He wanted to reproach her; but, with the memory of his own falseness still upon him, he could not. She sighed, and just touched his hand, saying mechanically that she hoped he would be happy too.

"Nay, shake hands, Eva, heartily," he said; "let me see your face, that there is no hardness in it."

She turned towards him actually with a smile, holding out her hand with a strong clasp, and uttering a reply in the most commonplace phrases.

"Mentally, I should like my sister to remain as they were; but I shan't quarrel with you because you would not, and it is much better to seem friends than nothing at all to each other, or enemies."

Her proud eyes went over his face like a flash. Then the white lids fell slowly over her eyes again, and she murmured dreamily:

"Better so, better so. Well, then, good-bye, Mr. Doyle, good-bye," and she sadly turned away.

"Good-bye, Eva," he answered.

He had never expected such a reception as this—by her own free will she had given him up. Her proud spirit made him feel the littleness of his own action. He began to regret now, to value the prize he had lost. But it was too late. He touched her hand, bent and kissed it, and in silence passed out of the room, and with a strange heaviness at heart re-entered his carriage and drove away from the quiet home in which he had often declared his passion and registered the holy vow which he so sinfully had broken. He looked back at the slender, graceful form at the window. The face was more colorless than the misty-webbed curtains amid whose folds it gleamed like a dead face—white as he imagined Evelyn's face would look in her coffin. He half uttered the cry for the coachman to stop, and even then he would have gone back and pleaded for a reunion; but while he looked back into the dimness of the room behind her she glided slowly away, and only filmy lace swept and undulated where she had stood.

"So," murmured Evelyn "the end has come at last. I cannot stay here. I cannot, dare not go back to my old home. Surely this glitter and luxury is but a dream. Oh, my heart, my heart! Is it to be that? I must be an outcast, after all!"

Poor child, better that than return to the roof of Stephen Plummer—better that than witness the fearful tragedy too soon to be enacted there. Yet how little tragic did Newton Villa look on this night, when, while the dusky twilight dispersed, Mrs. Plummer stood at the old place by the window, thinking, in fearless sorrow, of the time when she had oft waited there to welcome the loved face of Evelyn.

Darkness was coming on and found her still there, until the noise of carriage-wheels made her turn pale and start back. Sad as this is to own, she feared the return of Plummer to his own home. If this was wrong on her part, it was a sin on his to make her so. This time, however, her fears were groundless. Only a cab pulled up a short distance past the house—pulled up suddenly, as if the man had driven beyond his distance. A few minutes later a tall, dark shadow flitted by the window, paused, partly turned, and then darted up the steps.

THEATRES AND HALLS OF AMERICA.

Wondering, almost fearing, Mrs. Plummer rushed out of the parlor to open the door. When it was opened, a tall, muscular man with Roman beard and classic face, as far as she could see, stood on the threshold.

"Does Mrs. Brierley live here?" he asked in kindly but stentorian tones, for his deep-chested voice seemed to ring through the little house.

"Yes, sir."

The almost herculean form strode into the hall, and Mrs. Plummer backed into the parlor until she got a full view of his face, and then, turning deadly pale, she uttered a shriek.

"Is it you? O God! you, De Vere, you!" But she could say no more, and she fell fainting to the floor.

Hetty and the charwoman had heard Mrs. Plummer's scream, and now hastened into the room with a light. In a moment the returned exile retired to the far end of the room, while the other two restored Ellen to consciousness. She was not long insensible. The sudden mental shock was not a serious one, and with her reason came her usual caution.

"Thank you, I am better. You can leave me now, and you too, darling Hetty." Hetty and Mrs. Ford withdrew, and they were alone.

"It seems like seeing one returned from the grave," murmured Ellen. "I never expected this."

"Ah, my dear Ellen," said Devere, embracing her, and kissing her pale cheek, "life is too uncertain for such as I to play with chances. I started at a moment's notice, and am here safe, thank God and you, best of good, angelic women. It needs no second look for me to see that you have been all a mother to my darling Eva. God bless you!" He retained the hand only of Ellen's with his own right palm, and looked smilingly into her face.

"Where is Evelyn?" he ejaculated.

"Then I am to lose her after all?" said Ellen sorrowfully.

"No. You will come, too, Ellen. I must take my darling to the hotel. Will you not come?"

"Alas, I am married, Mr. De Vere. As you value your life, go from here. Here is my husband. Quick, sir—into another room. You must not see him—Stephen Plummer!"

But it was too late. A gig drove up, and a thickset man staggered out and up the steps, and, opening the door with a latch-key, he reeled into the hall, breathing hard, stumbling and rolling like a man in his first attempt to tread a ship's deck, and so he made his appearance in the presence of De Vere.

CHAPTER XVI.

AND THAT WAS THE LAST BLOW HE EVER STRUCK HER.

A dread stillness followed the entrance of Stephen Plummer into that little parlor. Mr. De Vere drew back into the shade. Mrs. Plummer faced her husband with that placid, stubborn air that always conquered him when he was sober. Would that he was sober now.

"Stephen," she said very sternly, and with an emphasis that meant to say "Behave yourself." Aloud she said: "The gentleman is a friend of Evelyn's."

"Then w'y don'sher 'ave a light? 'ood-ev'ning—wish down, s-s-sir."

The door closed and left the room. Ellen rushed forward, saying:

"Go. Send a messenger in the morning saying where I can see you, sir. Go, go, for her sake—she is not here. Good-night. Heaven guard you."

She opened the door, and Devere pushed him out, and closed it upon her immediately. When she returned to the parlor Mrs. Ford had taken in a light and closed the shutters. Stephen, who had fallen into a drunken doze, started when his wife entered and stared at her with blear eyes.

"Where's he got to?"

I will not imitate any further his imperfect articulation, being more likely to bore than please.

"Who gone, Stephen?"

"No, not Stephen—him, him," and then he chuckled, "you don't know him. Never mind. Look here, I—I'm done for; the last was a bad spec; I want more money."

"I have none. Heavens, you cannot want any more sacrifices."

"You've none?" he cried, starting up and dashing his fist on the table. "Then get it."

Then the beast-like brute, with such threats that aroused every bit of her anger and indignation, said that at four o'clock the next day men would arrive to negotiate a bill of sale on Merton Villa and furniture. He threatened to sell right out all Ellen's house property, all that was left her now, and then wound up with:

"She's got money. You put it away for her ever since she was a kid. Give it me. She won't want it, now her father's here. Ha! ha! Think I didn't know him in a minute? No mistake in James Emanuel De Vere. Besides, me and Conyer's got a scheme on—look here at this advertisement. 'Next of Kin.—Any of the children of J. E. De Vere or De Vere Hope, applying to Charles Gammon, solicitor, will hear of something to their advantage. Solicitor to Lord De Vere Hope, deceased, etc., etc.' That's enough, aint it? Well, Conyer and me is going to swear to her being the right party. Conyer knows all about the De Veres, and now I'll denounce J. E. De Vere, I reckon, by ——. He don't come to terms he will suit Conyer and me."

"Never, by Heavens, shall you, Stephen Plummer. I would kill you first, coward! drunkard! brute! You would rob the child of the man who took you out of the gutter, and then sell the father. Enough of this! From to-night we part—aye, forever. I have suffered enough, and God keep you from my path, if you raise my wrath any more."

And she left the room. But with such a brute beast as Plummer was when drunk every measure failed to quiet him. He started up with an oath and followed her, taunting her about her age, and throwing out grossly insulting insinuations about Eva being the style for him. Mrs. Ford, seeing that there would be another of those dreadful scenes that had nearly broken the heart of her mistress and often caused her bodily suffering, whispered to Hetty to go and fetch her father, but to tell him to keep out of sight, that Plummer might not see him. This was a wise precaution, for once, when Plummer caught Jasper Strong in the house, he knocked him, nearly insensible, by an unexpected blow, and hurled him into the road.

Poor little Hetty, glad to escape for a few moments, hastened away to fetch her father, and Plummer, still violently abusing the good woman, staggered up to the bedroom, and long demanded the key of a small rosewood box in which Ellen kept all those communications from the colonies, together with deeds and documents that still secured to Eva a decent sum of money, and by her the villa and furniture. Even those they had been married Plummer had tried by persuasion, when sober, and brutality when drunk, to get the contents of this box. But he had ruined her now, and this receptacle as good as held all that remained to keep her from utter poverty.

"Plummer," cried she in a frenzy, "touch this if you dare."

"Give me the key, then."

"Never, by heavens!"

He laughed savagely in her face.

"I tell you I have sold up the place. All here belongs to me. Give me the key."

"Never!"

Then, with the fury of a wolf, he leapt forward, and, snatching the box from her arms, dashed it to the ground, and it burst open, the lid lying in scattered splintered fragments. The woman bravely struggled then to obtain the packet of letters from New England, but the demon drink made the powerful brute mad. He forgot everything, and struck his wife a violent blow on the cheek. There was a livid, flaming scar there a moment afterwards. His wife reeled, then recoiled from him. Not a word did she utter. Every other part of her face save where the blow dealt was pale and rigid, and she herself seemed turned into stone. The dreadful dank gleam in her eyes was something vampire-like as she watched him. At last she drew a long, quivering breath, and went to the door. Raising her hand on high, and upturning her fearless, fire-lit eyes, she said in a voice that struck a chill to his heart:

"Hear me, O God! that this shall be the last blow this monster will ever strike me."

The street-door had been noiselessly opened, and Jasper Strong, led by his daughter, stole stealthily downstairs into the kitchen. Hetty feared to go to bed, and Mrs. Ford, poor old soul, sat shivering in the chimney-corner. All three, pale and trembling, sat listening for sounds from above. They heard the crash made by the box being dashed down, then the scuffle, the slamming of doors, and then Plummer staggering out of his bedroom. Then there was a brief stillness, broken at last by Plummer calling for Mrs. Ford. The master of the house wanted food and drink, and would have it. Mrs. Ford, terrified for fear he should rush down to the kitchen, promised to lay the cloth and produce the whole contents of the larder. He was satisfied, and sat down, while the charwoman loaded a tray with cold meat, pickles, cheese, and bread and beer. Plummer had an appetite that was perfectly awful to contemplate—an appetite such as can only arise through long hours of fasting and excessive drinking. He ate ravenously for more than half an hour, and for one hour and a half after that he sat drinking and reading the letters and papers which Ellen had for so long kept from all human eyes but her own. He had said that it was a paper-chase could remain as it was until morning, so that Mrs. Ford had retired, and the frightened trio sat in the kitchen undisturbed. Mrs. Ford had brought a mattress down for Jasper Strong to lie upon.

"I shan't go to bed yet," he said. "A little drop of something to keep me company, and yer can go to bed."

"Sure, sure," said Mrs. Ford, and she found some spirits for him to regale himself with.

Jasper Strong mixed himself a stiff glass of rum and water, and sat down by the fire, meditating deeply, or rather brooding over something connected with his past that left very ugly and gloomy shadows on his white and grimy face. Little Hetty sat looking at him in silence, and at the slightest sound from upstairs was ready to fly back to her refuge from danger—the adjacent coal-cellar.

They heard Plummer stagger from the dining-room upstairs. He seemed worse than before, and muttered savagely to himself. Outside the bedchamber in which Ellen had taken refuge he paused, and after a moment's deliberation he knocked loudly with his knuckles, and called upon his wife to return to her proper quarters. Then Jasper Strong and his companions heard him issue a volley of disgraceful abuse, and lastly retire to his own room and his bed.

"At last," muttered Strong, and then fell to brooding again.

"Father, you aint a-going home?" asked Hetty wistfully.

"What I and leave you here to his mercy? T'aint likely. Look ye here at this scar on my lip!—he gave it to me, and more, too, the powerful brute. He aint fit to live amongst Christians. Go to bed, Het: and you too, Mrs. Ford. I'll sit up a little while."

They went to bed, and Strong was alone. The fire gave out a bright, red glow; the candle had burnt out, and he forgot to light another, for he was brooding again. The stillness deepened as the dead hours of morning came on—the dead hours during which the very waters seem to stand still, and all nature sleeps.

Jasper Strong sips the remainder of his rum, and thinks of lightning his pipe. His mind is wandering back to Manchester and the little grave that contains the first and last partner of his poverty and toil, when the opening of a door above-stairs and the stealthy fall of a heavy foot made him start up and his eyes blaze under the lurid glow of the flameless fire.

Still, with the same startled and deadly look on his face, he removes his boots and lays them aside, that his footsteps should not be heard, and then, in a crouching attitude, he made his way upstairs. After every second or third step he pauses to listen as the person creeping about above seems to pause and listen. But he is before the bedroom door at last, and there he sees Mrs. Plummer, holding a candle above her head, and looking as if she walked in her sleep, so pale and rigid is her face, so distant is the look in her motionless eyes. Very softly she enters the room. There on the bed lies Plummer. His right arm is under his head, his right hand clutches the packet of letters, whose testimony would make Eva the daughter of a felon. Ellen, like one in a dream, sets the candle down and contemplates the sleeper, the letters, and lastly a small curved sword that hangs over the head of the bed. Another moment, and the gleaming, scabbardless instrument is in her hand. The drunkard breathes heavily, snores and scowls even in his sleep, and his hand tightens on the packet of letters.

"You know him," she muttered, "and would bring ruin and disgrace on her devoted head. May God forgive me, for this is the result of your own work, Stephen Plummer."

In a moment the scene changes. Plummer is partly sitting up, holding Ellen by the waist. He tries to cry out. There is blood upon him and upon the bed. Jasper Strong, with a catlike leap, is in the room, the candle is knocked out, the sword snatched away from her, something like a blow, a groan low as a whistle, and when the gray dawn of day peeps in it throws its cold light upon the lifeless form of Plummer, the blood-reeking weapon in Strong's hand, and Ellen looking on as if she had been suddenly awakened, startled, and petrified into stone.

OUR ENGRAVING.

The New Academy of Music, Cumberland, Md., is located in the new City Hall, and was formally dedicated to the drama by a company under the management of John T. Ford of Baltimore, Md., March 7, 1876. A full description of the edifice was published in THE CLIPPER dated March 18, 1876.

OF COURSE.—In a Broadway stage, the other day, a gentleman was greatly attracted toward a little girl of seven or eight, who was in charge of her aunt. After chatting with her for several minutes in a jovial way he put on a very solemn look and inquired: "You are a very nice little girl. I shouldn't wonder if you soon had an offer of marriage." "And I shouldn't wonder if I accepted it quicker'n wink!" was her prompt reply.

A MAN may hold his tongue at the wrong time.

SNAGSBY'S LUCK.

WRITTEN FOR THE CLIPPER BY GEO. DUDLEY LAWSON.

Poor old Snagsby! For good heart, struggles, and unappreciated genius he was a hero of the first water—a martyr of the highest order. An Admirable Crichton in all things, a poet, artist, historian and actor, he wrote his own plays, made up the wardrobe with his own hands, and swung the color-brush with great effect upon the broad canvas. In poetry, blank verse was his forte; in acting, old men; and when it came to scene-painting, he was particularly strong on moons and heavy shadow effects. He used to say that Stansberry had quite a pretty trick of making interiors and exteriors in high and middle lights, but there was not one in ten thousand of the craft who could equal himself in giving an idea of how things looked in the dark. To be sure, it was a slight drawback, that in front there were few with eyes so telescopic as to see more than a white cheese at top of the flat, and a slashed pyramid of yellow ochre and sheen running down from the centre; yet, take Snagsby's word for it, there were wonderful depths, perspective and form, that the glamor of the footlights tended to throw into obscurity.

As Falstaff, he rivaled, in his own estimation, the best efforts of Hackett or Ben De Bar, and played all round Ned Davenport's Sir Giles Overreach, though, truth to tell, he had never been cast in either of these parts, and only judged his excellence by comparisons between those masterpieces and his own performance of the drunk as a piper.

"Congratulate me, boys. I've got the best of the bargain after all. The widow was a stall; not worth a picayune, a silver, a fardin'. Middleton is sold out about the cheapest the town ever saw. Set 'em up, Tommy."

"You are sure of that, Snagsby?" queried one of his auditors.

"Sure of it? You bet. You know old Mam Flickers, that keeps the hash-house down by the Spring-street Market? Well, Middy and his blooming bride are lodging in her second-floor-back, and she is going to warn them out for lack of a fortnight's rent. Hoop-la!"

It was genuine. Middleton, the bright, dashing young scamp, skipped very shortly, and left a grass-widow to mourn.

A JUNE NIGHT.

WRITTEN FOR THE NEW YORK CLIPPER, BY WILL STUART.

If I could only see you standing here, dear love,
Where starbeams weave pale threads of tender light—
To bind our souls to loved ones called above—
My heart would feel a sweet content to-night.

The air is laden with the dainty, rich perfume,
That always lingers on the earth in June,
And as its subtle fragrance haunts my mazy room,
The bay waves lull me with a languid tune.

The deep, calm waters of the star-strewn bay
Throb only with the heart-beats of the greater sea;
The wind sighs low, while darkness spreads its mantle
And in the hovering hush my soul cries out for thee.

Over the shadowy leagues of sea and land,
That come between and keep our lives apart,
Could I but reach and touch your little hand,
A respite would drift in my yearning heart.

But Fate wills that our paths trend separate ways
Through the dim future 'till we find their ends,
And so a weary loneliness fills all my days,
Like some lone wanderer far from home and friends.

Norfolk, Va., June, 1876.

LOVE ONLY.

WRITTEN FOR THE NEW YORK CLIPPER, BY MRS. E. BURKE COLLINS.

"A face for a painter to rave about!"

I glanced down from my window upon the swaying, laughing crowd beneath. It was carnival time in the fair city of my birth—merry, mirth-loving New Orleans, calling to mind sunny Florence, in my father's native Italy, "sitting enthroned amidst her meadows, white with lilies," with the music of the dead past upon her breath, and filled with a sorcery which no one can resist. My eyes gazed upon a scene of revelry and gayety such as makes glad the carnival time in that joyous city, where, even amid its woes and griefs and wrongs, laughter bubbles up continually from never-empty springs, and where they strew dead sorrows with the roses and lilies of forgetfulness, turning their backs upon the mournful past; for the future, in the distance, looks bright, and beckons onward.

My hands were filled with clusters of yellow roses.

"A face for a study, Duke. That is our Beatrice!"

My eyes met those of the speaker, as he repeated his flattering words; but, proud as I was of the face which he praised, I felt no gratified vanity for this man; Gen. Luigi I detested with all my heart. And yet he was my father's friend—an Italian patriot—wealthy, old and blase. The man whom he had called Duke lifted his eyes to my face—great, melancholy, slumbrous orbs of brown. Just then a stray rosebud fluttered from my hand, and fell at his feet. He stooped and raised it from the dust, doffed the slouched hat which he wore, pressed the rosebud to his lips, and then he was lost to sight in the ever-changing crowd of merry revelers.

A hot flush shot athwart my cheek. How dared he, poor, unknown Duke Arlington, earning his daily bread by the hard toil of the professional painter—how dared he lift his eyes to my face in admiration? I was proud—very cruelly proud. Proud of my birth, for my father was an Italian nobleman (of my mother I knew little; she had died in my infancy); proud of the wealth and station which society allotted to me, and the face which Nature had bestowed upon me. It had ever been thus. I remembered nothing but homage from my childhood, when my father had placed me in a New Orleans convent, and left me to await his coming there. The lessons should be forever ended, and I be launched upon the smiling, pitiless world. Aye, smiling, when the bright side of life is turned towards it; but pitiless as death, relentless as the grave, when dark clouds lower around your pathway. I did not know all that, then; afterwards I grew wiser.

My noble, handsome father! To me, in my childish dreams, he was the most perfect creature in the universe—a very demigod among men. How I thought of him by day and dreamed of him at night, and worshiped his portrait as I worshiped the saints in their shrines, inside our gloomy convent walls. But I never forgot our position, and our hereditary name; the Castellos were of the noblest in our lovely Italy. Once only, during all the years of probation, my father came to me for a brief space. He laid his white hand on my heavy curls, and raised my face to a level with his own, while his great, dark eyes searched my face.

"You will be very beautiful, Beatrice!" he said, approvingly; and then a shade crossed his handsome features as he added: "And so very like your mother!"

He pushed me away from him then; and that night he left me alone again, with the kind sisters in the convent. Already I had learned my power—knew what danger can lurk behind the masked smiles of a woman, what demons peer forth from lustrous, shining eyes. They teach many arts in the convent, and many lessons are learned by women which intuition alone brings them; there was always such teaching there in the heart in willing. The good old sisters were wont to remonstrate with me on my terrible pride and the certain punishment awaiting it. But I would only raise my eyes haughtily, and in imperious tones cry angrily:

"You forget yourselves, I am a Castello; noble blood is in my veins. The Castellos know no masters!"

Ah, how those wild, senseless words came back on my heart in the after years, when I bowed my head in the dust at my feet!

And now the convent days were over, and I was happy with my father in the beautiful home to which he had brought me. I poured out at his feet the worship of my whole heart; but he was as cold to me as marble. Never a caress or a loving word was mine, and my life grew to be one grand, glittering nothing. Perhaps the chief cause of the estrangement between us was this man, Gen. Luigi. He had been my father's dearest friend since they had left Italy together, years before. He had known my mother; for that reason alone I had tolerated him, for I hated the coarse, sensual old aristocrat with an intensity not natural in a woman; but then, I am of talian parentage and know how to hate.

I had met Duke Arlington many times; but his position in society was so vastly different from mine, he could never reach the same altitude and stand by my side. Never before that morning had he attempted the slightest act of familiarity, but had ever held himself aloof with quiet dignity. Perhaps he was proud, too! But that day my eyes had beheld his one act of temerity, and wrath blazed and burned in my proud heart while I vowed retaliation. I see him often afterwards, when the carnival lights were quenched. I saw him as I drove with my father and allowed my eyes to fall full upon his handsome face as he stood in the street. Just one cold, careless glance, with no trace of recognition, and then our carriage dashed by, the mud from its wheels spattering him as we went. I caught the look of fire which leaped into his flashing eyes and noted the scornful curve to his scarlet lip; and although I whispered triumphantly to myself, "I have my revenge for his insolence!" there rankled in my heart a feeling of uneasiness.

My father came and stood by my side one morning, with a pale face and constrained manner, and I fancied a sterner look than usual in his dark eyes.

"Beatrice," he said coldly, averting his gaze as he spoke, "Gen. Luigi is coming here to-night to ask your hand in marriage. I have promised that you shall be his wife."

And then he was gone, and I was left alone to wrestle with my bitter fate. Strange that I had never before suspected my father's intentions in regard to my future. So this was to be the end of all! I, with the pride of the Castellos in my heart, was to be deliberately bartered away, sold like any slave in the public market-place! It was monstrous, it was cruel, it was horribly unnatural. In my youth and innocence I knew not that it was a most common occurrence in daily life, and only the way of the world. My heart was crushed and broken; but my pride was mighty still, and sitting there, in the solitude of my own room, I resolved, notwithstanding my great love for my father, to rebel to the very last. So I went down stairs to meet my tormentor, with my mind made up, fully determined to win the battle. Gravely I listened to his words; quietly but firmly I told him my decision. His wicked old face flushed for a moment, but an amused smile played about his thin lips.

"It is as I expected, cara mia," he answered quietly; "but I can wait."

"You need not wait, Gen. Luigi," I made answer, coldly, "for I shall never marry you!"

He saw then that my words were not prompted by the waywardness of a child or the coyness of a maiden, and his face grew clouded, and his eyes flashed angrily:

"Remember, signora," he hissed, "that this is your father's wish—n

NEW YORK CLIPPER.

SATURDAY, JUNE 24, 1876.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

☞ Letters seeking information replied to only through this department; no answers by mail.

W. S. POTTER.—"Your answer in THE CLIPPER of June 17, to 'A. A. Carlisle,' was: 'Yes; B played correctly.' I, being an interested party, would ask you through the columns of THE CLIPPER to explain more fully your meaning. The circumstance as stated in the question gives rise to the point: Can A score one for a 'go' and one for the last cross if under the second 31, and also one for his king played last? My opinion of a 'go' is that it is a penalty of one point against the party holding cards, none of which can be played under the 31; but in this case B had played his last card, consequently he could not say 'go.' There is the point in dispute, and if you can and will be kind enough to give us an explanation you will confer a favor."..... We have again to answer that B played correctly. Your opinion of the meaning of the word "go," as you describe it above, is wrong, and instead of the last player being at a disadvantage by holding cards that won't come under 31, it is the reverse. After A had played his ten spot it was a "go" for himself, as well as for B, whose cards had run out. It will be seen also that A's king is the only "last card" (there can only be one), for which one point should be taken.

CASS, Detroit.—"One man is out; two men are on bases, and third and second strike at his (the ball) man leaves second and runs to third, touches third base; then, seeing he had forced the man from third, returns to second and holds it: the man at third, as soon as the striker hit the ball, leaves his base and attempts to make the home plate, but is put out between bases. The ball is then thrown to second, and the baseman touches runner while on his base. Umpire decides man holding second out, as he claims man was compelled to hold third after reaching it, and he could not hold second base."..... As the player running from second to third touched third before the man on third had touched home-base, the former had no right to third—to hold it and not return to second—and therefore could not be put out while on second base, unless forced to leave second by the striker.

OLIVER ROYER, Courtney.—"A ball is batted to short, who throws high to first, the baseman having to jump for it, the runner in the interim reaching first; but just before touching the base he is kicked on the leg by the baseman as he jumps. Is the runner out?".....No; the base-player must touch the base-runner with the ball, before the latter reaches first base, to put him out, or hold the ball while touching the base. 2. A ball touching the fielder fairly is a fair ball, whether it bounds from his hands to foul ground or not. 3. The seven wonders of the world used to be the Colossus of Rhodes, the Pyramids of Egypt, the Pharos of Alexandria, the Walls and Hanging Gardens of Babylon, the Temple of Diana at Ephesus, the Statue of the Olympian Jupiter, and the Mausoleum.

CHRISTIANA.—Your table is wholly deceptive. It makes the eight clubs figure in 1,120 different ways, when the number is but 560; it makes them play 560 games, when really they play but 280. Each club plays in seventy games, it is true; and it is equally true that eight times seventy are 560. It must be borne in mind, however, that it takes two clubs to play a game, and that therefore it is proper to count but one half the number of games each club plays to-day in a match at your table again, and you will see that, for example, the seventy games you have credited the Athletics with winning, you have also credited them with losing; this process you have repeated in the case of every other club.

BURDICK HOUSE, Cincinnati.—Suppose A bet that the Athletics beat the Louisvilles by one run, and B bet that "argue that it is therefore understood, though not expressed," that B, by his silence, takes the converse of the proposition and bets that the Louisvilles will win by one run? Is A entitled to one run? If if not, how can he win? We argue that B cannot be held to mean more than he says, and that A is to be held to mean just what he says. If B will admit that he meant to assume the converse of the proposition, there is no chance for a dispute; but if he insists that he assumed only the negative, as his action or language shows, if it shows anything at all, then he is entitled to the benefit of any doubt.

TEATRO, Arequipa, Peru.—To succeed upon the variety stage you should practice some specialty until you excel in it. Then get an interview with some manager, show him what you can do, and solicit an engagement. What you mean you mean the variety stage as you speak of playing the banjo. If you mean the dramatic stage, get an engagement to play general utility, and then study the parts which you are not too old to commence. Your handwriting is only fair. Being able to speak Spanish fluently would be of service to you.

C. F. GAUL, Lake View.—"I was running the bases; the pitcher made a regular motion to pitch, but he had the ball in his left hand; I started for third; he threw the ball to third, and the baseman touched me; I claimed a ball; the umpire decided me out, as the pitcher had not the ball in his right hand. I claim if the pitcher has the ball in either hand, and goes like motion to pitch, it does not stop a ball." ..... It is immaterial in which hand the ball is. It was a ball.

G. G., Springfield.—II. Trapeze performers must have a net. The prices of them vary according to material used, size, etc. Inquire of some person who makes fishing-nets. 2. Of any lithographer. A good lithograph will cost you $125 for the drawing and 30 cents for each impression made. Managers do not furnish them. 3. $3.75 for each insertion. 20 per cent. off if paid for three months (13 insertions) in advance. 4. There are plenty of club-swingers that do not travel with their clubs, and vice versa.

AMATI, Matoon.—1, 2. A person having had such experience as you state would be qualified to fill the position of interlocutor in a negro minstrel troupe, but managers never engage a man for that business only. 3. The average salary of a second old man is about $35 per week. 4. A character actor and dialect comedian commands from $40 to $150 per week. 5. Managers do not, as a general thing, act as agents, as a general thing, are not so large as in theatres. 6. About eight words to a line.

WICKOFF, Lowell.—1. The umpire could not call it an exhibition game without the consent of the two nines. If the nines consented, the character of the game was changed, and all bets then pending were off at once. 2. The umpire has nothing to do with deciding bets. His deciding them "off" in this case was harmless, because they would have been "off" even had he decided them "on."

OLD SUBSCRIBER, New Orleans.—1. Neither is out. Cassino is a game of memory, and it is by virtue of memory that "calls" are made. A man who calls out must do so before the last trick is lifted, and without looking back at his cards to count them. Then, should he make an overclaim, the penalty of his defective memory is forfeiture of game, point and all. 2. Miss Jone Burke is attached to the regular company of a theatre in this city.

F. W. B.—1. When "The Black Crook" was originally produced at Niblo's Garden in this city, the late Betty Canendias and Caroline Rose. 2. Miss Fanny Davenport never acted in "The Black Crook" at Niblo's Garden, nor has she ever played a professional engagement in that theatre. 4. Barney Carter died in Washington, D. C., on Sept. 22, 1849. 5. Miss May Howard was born in 1845. 6. Lotta has not retired from the stage.

SUBSCRIBER, Franklin.—The old method of playing pinpool (and in some sections of the country it is so played to-day) was for the player to follow his "burst." The more prevalent practice now is for him to announce the burst as one ran in (Indoor, No. 1 time), and to choose between the new and the old, and then wait for his turn to play to come round. Should he have no chance to play, he is not charged for his "privilege."

CONSTANT READER, Albany.—1. Ion was about 20 years of age at the time referred to. 2. W. C. Macready died in Weston Super Mare, England, April 26, 1873, at the age of 81 years. 3. There are no plays with characters suitable for boys. Managers will not engage boys. Actors make their own engagements or employ a dramatic agent to do so for them.

C. H., Oil City.—"C bets J that no baseball can be pitched so that the ball will curve to either side, by twist or any other influence used on the ball, when it first touches the ground." ..... The curve undoubtedly marks the delivery of several pitchers, as also the throwing of well-known fielders. We cannot explain the theory of such a curve, but that it is done is no question.

J. W.—1. See our billiard report of the Garnier-Rudolphe game for a discussion of this matter. We cannot tell from your diagrams whether Garnier practically made a push or not—it is improbable that he did. 2. A foul is not the same as a miss. It is bad enough to make a carom and lose it by accident, without being further penalized for it. The idea of not having a point for a miss is to restrict safety-play.

T. H., Cambridge.—1. It is not necessary that a man shall have voted in order to render him eligible to any office. All that is necessary is for him to be entitled to vote if he wishes to vote. 2. We cannot say how many times President Grant voted before he became President. 3. His appointment as lieutenant-general was made March 2, 1864.

J. D.—Barnum.—Referred to forfeit; you refer to what is not in existence in 1869. We have given the Reds credit for not having lost a game in 1869. Your idea about hostility against the present Cincinnati nine is all moonshine. We have no "hostility or spite" against any nine, but are only hostile to the employment of crooked players.

INQUIRER, St. Albans.—Very few circus managers permit games on running wheels of fortune to travel with their shows. 2. Those that do so receive a heavy recompense for the privilege. 3. Montgomery Queen's and Cooper & Bailey's Circuses are traveling west of the Mississippi River.

D. AND M.—When bets are made on a club defeating another in one or two innings, if of course means that the score of the nine in one or two innings is greater than that of the other in all the innings played. It could not be otherwise, as it takes five innings at least to make a game.

W. P. C.—You are suffering from stage fright, and nothing will do you any good until you overcome that. Continued appearance before the public will accomplish it. Get an opportunity to go on nightly in some other capacity until you acquire ease, then give your banjo performances.

J. P. P., Boston.—We cannot tell you whether Wheeler's Circus performed in the National Theatre in your city in 1864 or since that time. That theatre was burned March 16, 1865, and, we believe, was not rebuilt for amusement purposes.

X. Y. Z., Morrisonville.—It depends upon what rules the game is played under. If professional, a ball touching the base is dead; if amateur, the batter is called "out on ball." In the former case no base can be run; in the latter a base can be run.

H. W. Whitehall.—Base-runners running bases on fair or foul fly-balls can be put out in returning to bases on either a foul or a fair fly under the League rules; but under the amateur rules they cannot be put out in returning to a foul fly, though they can do a fair fly.

MASSEILY FIRE COMPANY NO. 2.—Of course if a pitcher insists upon delivering an illegal ball the umpire must decide the game ended by forfeit. Amateurs play by the rules of the Amateur Association, as published in the revised edition of the Guide of 1876.

A Subscriber, Stapleton.—No such score as 1 to 0 was ever made before 1875 by any club, and the match Union vs. Reds referred to was 13 to 0 in favor of the Reds at the end of the ninth inning. There are now about five games on record of 1 to 0 played since the opening of 1876.

C. H., Springfield.—We have never had any practical experience with fire-balloons, therefore cannot answer your questions satisfactorily. We will say that it is extremely dangerous for inexperienced persons to attempt an ascension in one.

H. C. B., Pittsburg.—The umpire should have decided the game by a score of 9 to 0 in favor of the Athletics; however, whether the score is 5 to 3 or 9 to 0. He loses either way, for the Philadelphias won neither in one inning nor in any other way.

O. B., Pittsburg.—Bets that the Philadelphias would beat the Braddocks in one inning, and would beat them three to one, are not affected by the umpire's error. Whether the score is 5 to 3, or 9 to 0, the backers of the Philadelphias lose all such bets.

A. R. D., Richmond.—1. Not at all distances. He has made the best recorded time in snow-shoes, in two, three and four miles. 2. During August, 1875, the Paris crew of St. John, N. B., have never been beaten by a crew from the United States.

JAMES GRAY, Manchester.—The first regular professional club was the Cincinnati, and the first game between one professional nine and another may be said to have been played in 1869.

H. H., San Francisco.—1. The Bostons were champions last year. 2. Your other queries are of a class we do not answer, as it is a mere matter of opinion as to which nine is the best player in the league.

G. W. D., Charleston.—A jerk is legal. In fact, all methods of delivering the ball are legal, provided the arm in delivery passes the side and the ball in hand is below the hip. If on the line of the hip, it is illegal.

HOOKS No. 1, Brockton.—A loss. A "skunk," whether applied to cards or baseball, does not mean one hand or one game. It means that in the whole game one of the contestants will not score a point.

OLD SUBSCRIBER, Rochester.—Last U. S. census (1870): New York City, 942,292; Philadelphia, 674,022; Washington, D. C., 109,204; London, Eng. (estimated in 1875), 3,446,161.

T. JOHNSON.—We cannot afford the space to describe the figures of the dance. "Ball-room Companion," which you can get at almost any book-store, will give you the information.

A. IRVE WARNER.—Daniel O'Leary is reported to have walked 400 miles in less than six consecutive days in San Francisco, Cal., but at present we are not disposed to accept the time given as correct.

TURNER, Hartford.—1. Tom Sayers never fought Sam Hurst, whose first recorded battle—that with Tom Paddock—took place Nov. 5, 1850, after Sayers had retired. 2. He did not.

JACK AND BILL.—"A foul ball is struck in the air and strikes a fence on the fly, and is caught on the first bounce from the fence. Is it out or not?".....Not out, of course.

MR. J., Boston.—No answers by mail. We have had no later intelligence from Chiarini's Circus than that referred to in your letter.

SARNY.—It is fairly caught ball on the fly if it does not touch the ground first, no matter what part of the fielder's person the ball touches.

E. J. S., Brattleboro.—The run does not count if the striker is put out at first base, or if the third player out is forced out at any other base.

W. D., Pawtucket.—There is no difference between a square foot and a foot square, but two feet square covers twice as much surface as two square feet.

A SUBSCRIBER, Ottawa.—We do not express opinions as to the soundness of such institutions, privately or otherwise.

G. D.—By applying personally at the New York office of either Wine Star or Inman line, you could probably get special rates for that number of people.

J. L., Albany.—It was expressly stated that that measurement applied to tonnage only. The question was as to general size, and not as to mere length or breadth.

LOUISVILLE.—The Mutuals have won a game from the Hartfords.

ATHLETIC.—We take no account of any but first-base hits.

DETROIT.—"If A and B agree to play 500 points at billiards, how many strings, do they have to play, at 34 points on each string, to constitute 500 points at American football game?".....As the case is here stated, they would have each to play fourteen "strings" and twenty-four points over.

J. MCCANN, Chicago.—King was knocked out of time in the 17th round of his battle with Heenan, but no one claimed the fight for the American, and, though nearly five minutes elapsed before Tom could be brought to the scratch again, the fight was renewed, and ended in a victory for the Englishman.

T. D. F., St. Louis.—The replies to your several queries, up to the close of 1875, will be found in THE CLIPPER ALMANAC for 1876. Look for the Savannah, the Sirius and the Great Western in the Almanac's "Chronological History of the United States."

W. H. B., Hornellsville.—There is no bet if both pick the same candidate. Each should have privately given a name to the third party, who, if the second man matched the first, should have required the second man to name another person.

J. F. S., Grand Rapids.—The mayor or the superintendent-of-police can be telegraphed to. The mayor should, in courtesy, have the preference, if the complainant is an ordinary citizen; but matters of this kind are usually communicated through the chiefs-of-police of the two cities.

C. P. H.—I. We never publish the residences of professional ladies. A letter addressed to her in care of this office will reach her. 2. The same will apply to the pianist named. 3. Charley Pettingill died in Albany, N. Y., Oct. 10, 1870.

R. H. W., Ben Lomond.—Masses for the dead are gratuitously offered up daily in every Catholic church in the universe. Special masses requested by relatives are paid for by those relatives. They are of various kinds, and entail more or less expense upon the church.

M. S., Angola.—The express charge, not having been provided for in the terms of the bet, is not to be regarded as a legitimate part of the cost of the meal. As there might be no end to incidentals, the original cost must govern, and A wins.

ANXIOUS, St. Louis.—We do not undertake to keep track of the very elaborate list of all professionals during their Summer vacation. Letters addressed to the persons named in care of this office will reach them. We cannot say whether the gentleman is married or not.

CLERICUS, Boston.—Questions of this class, being as to mathematical proportion, can be solved by any arithmetician. Were we to make a feature of them, we should have them by the hundred weekly, and from every baseball field.

TELEGRAPH, Corrunna.—"According to rules of the Amateur Association. When a fair ball is struck, and a baserunner is between bases, can he be put out in retiring to his base? 2. Can a base-runner run on a foul-fly the same as a fair fly?".....1. No. 2. Yes.

TONY.—Jim Williams never was the manager of the Bowery Theatre in this city; nor was he ever, in any manner, connected with the management of the Union-square Theatre.

W. C. P., Petersburg.—No answers by mail. 1. We cannot give you the route ahead of Hart's Circus. 2. Address a letter to Tom Dawson (stating the show he was last with) in care of this office.

B. A. K., Baltimore.—The Kiralfy Brothers never appeared in "Around the World in Eighty Days" in any place. They have retired from the practice of their profession, and are engaged in management.

M. S., Detroit.—No answers by mail. Lizzie Walby died in Williamsburg, L. I., July 29, 1874.

S. H. T. JR.—No medicine is necessary, as they will come away of themselves in the natural course of things.

INDIANA, Denis.—Both contestants the nine who decline to finish a game forfeit it by 9 to 0.

WEST END.—Longfellow beat Harry Bassett for the Monmouth Cup, at Long Branch, July 2, 1870.

CENTENNIAL FOURTH OF JULY WEEK

NOTICE TO ADVERTISERS.

In consequence of THE FOURTH OF JULY falling upon Tuesday—our publication day—THE CLIPPER for that week will be published on Monday morning, July 3, and our advertisers will oblige us by mailing their favors so as to reach this office by the first mail on Sunday, July 2, as the post-office closes at 10 A. M., or by handing them in at our business department not later than 3 P. M. on that day. Such of our advertisers as desire their cards to appear on the outside are notified that those pages will be closed on Friday evening.

TO THE BREACH.

Solid men everywhere must now brace up and investigate Hayes. This gentleman has had a nice time of it during his political career, and if he aspects to go on in "the even tenor of his way" without molestation he will be dreadfully mistaken. He is now fairly before the people as a candidate for the Presidency, and if ever he slew a man in cold blood, picked an orphan's pocket, set fire to a church, robbed the widow, or tried to get into the circus by crawling under the canvas, let him tremble now if he never trembled before, for his sins will surely find him out, and the darkness of his crimes will be made clear as the noonday sun through the instrumentality of his political adversaries. Why, it was only on the evening of the day when the nomination was made that a friend assured us that he knew a man named Hayes who roped in a countryman at faro one night, and went through him to his bottom dollar; and he believed that this Western candidate is the identical roper-in! And another gentleman informed us confidentially that a man not unlike this Hayes was caught in the act of giving information to the enemy during our late unpleasantness, and he was only saved from being shot to death through the interference of the late A. Lincoln. And this morning the chairman of the Squankum Moral Reform Society called to inquire whether this Ohio man Hayes was not the great English prize-fighter Hayes, who, some years ago, over there, fought Jack Grant and several other London pugilists? As if we would go back on any of the pugs when they had got a good snap! Oh, no; we are not of that kind; but it goes to show that the wires are being pulled, and the dogs are being let loose upon him; and if this Ohio Governor doesn't get sick of the job before he is a month older, then say we are naught but false prophets. But between ourselves, gentle reader, there was a prize-fighter named Hayes, and he waxed some good men in the London Prize Ring; and though we do not say, positively, that this is the same man, we do not say that he isn't! Three or four years ago a clam-chowder party started from Mackerelville for a day's sport at Coney Island. While the party were in bathing one of the guests was robbed of ten one-thousand-dollar counterfeit U. S. bonds, and it was said that a man named Hayes of Cincinnati was the robber! Whether he was or was not we cannot say; but certain it is he didn't return home with the clam-chowder gentlemen! Like Charley Ross, he mysteriously disappeared. Wouldn't it be a sad thing if this Hayes should prove to be that Hayes? And yet stranger things than that have happened. We don't say that they are one and the same man; but everybody is not so charitable as we are. We have no desire to rake up old scores if the Governor has reformed; but has he reformed? May it not be that he is assuming a virtue? If he is the good man he pretends to be, he cannot interpose any objection to the people inquiring into his past career. Society demands a thorough investigation; and if Governor Hayes is guilty of any of the heinous crimes with which he is charged, or likely to be charged, in the cause of morality let the facts be made known, though the heavens fall! We have no objection to Mr. Hayes being made President if he is capable, if he is honest, if he is sans peur et sans reproche; but forbid it, decency, that we should put into the highest office in the gift of a nation of freemen a man so lost to all sense of shame, of honor, of virtue, as this man would seem to be if common report goes for anything in this country. We have nothing against this man. Nay, we love him, but we love our country more. Better, aye, far better that one innocent man should escape than that "the ninety and nine" guilty ones should suffer.

The "Sick Man."

There's a great deal of "dressing" in Turkey—
Good news for the gourmands who'd feed—
But to foreigners, I'm sorry to say,
You're often in Sultan indeed.
Beware of the foes all about you,
And, though England's assistance may nerve ye,
Eye sharply the great Russian bear
When coming with offers to Servia!

CENTENNIAL FOURTH OF JULY.

NEWSDEALERS will please take notice that THE CLIPPER will be published one day earlier than usual FOURTH OF JULY week, and govern themselves accordingly in ordering from their news companies.

THOSE GENTLEMEN who didn't get the nomination might succeed better in the army, where they could gratify their craving as per rations!

LADIES who go from store to store without purchasing anything are looked upon as order "nary" people.

"CABINET"-MAKERS are now investigating the Cincinnati platform, to ascertain if there is any "dead wood" in it.

BIRDS are like merchants when they are seeking a nest to make. See? An estimate.

TROTTING AT MYSTIC PARK.—The Summer trotting meeting at this Boston park commenced on Wednesday, June 14. The attendance was large, and the time made good, considering the state of the track. The first trot was for a purse of $600 for horses that had never beaten 2:34, the first heat to go to the first, second, third and fourth money, four horses contending. These third and fourth money, four horses contending. These were W. S. Sargent's b. g. Ed. Chapin; C. Dodge's b. g. Sleepy David; T. McAloon's b. g. Hiram Dyer; and B. F. Boardman's br. m. Josh Billings. The two last-named horses were distanced in the first heat, Ed. Chapin winning the race in three straight heats, time, 2:32½, 2:41, 2:33½. The second race was for a purse of $800 for horses that had never beaten 2:34, the first heat to be trotted for third money. The second race was won by J. Bowen's gray m. Lady Hazen in four straight heats, Grateful second, Lady Hazen third, and Cherokee was fourth. George H. took the first heat, and Cherokee was distanced in that heat. Time, 2:31, 2:31, 2:29½, 2:31. On the second day, 15th, two purses were trotted for, the first the second day, 15th, two purses were trotted for, the first being one of $600 for horses of the 2:45 class. It was won by the sorrel gelding Grateful in three straight heats, he beating Ed Chapin, Dick Moore, Gentlemilf and Captain Frank (distanced in the second heat). Time, 2:30, 2:28½, 2:31. The second trot was for a purse of $600, for horses of the 2:31 class, and nine horses appeared and started. Maggie B. took the first heat, Charles H. the second, and Lady Maggie Forry went to the front and won the next three heats and the race in 2:28, 2:28, 2:29. Maggie B. took second money, Charles H. third, and King William fourth money. The first race of the closing day, June 16, was for horses of the 2:36 class, for a purse of $600, which was contested for by eight horses, Gray Bell winning in four straight heats. Jay Gould, George Lad, won the first in 2:31, the time of the other three heats being 2:31, 2:32½, 2:34½. Clara Bell, Annie Lady Smith, Joe Johnson and Fly Fly were the beaten horses. Smith, Joe Johnson and Clara Bell taking the third and fourth money respectively. The second trot was for a purse of $1,000, for horses owned in New England, the first mile being $600, second mile $250, third $150, and fourth $100. It was won by the br. s. Commonwealth in four heats, beating Comet, who took the first heat in 2:34, Unknown Dan and Jubilee Lambert. Time, 2:34, 2:28, 2:28.

THE RHINEBECK PARK ASSOCIATION'S Spring trotting meeting commenced on Wednesday, June 14, but the attendance was far from being as large as was anticipated. Good sport was had, however, and the trotting gave general satisfaction. The three-minute purse of $250, divided, as were all the other purses, into first, second and third money, had seven starters, Washburn Brothers' bay mare Irish Maid being the winner in three straight heats, and beating W. H. Darby, W. H. Arnold, Creolie, Jr., and Frank Woodcock, the last-named distanced in the second heat. Time, 2:40, 2:39, 2:40. Then came the trot for the best three trials of horses entered for the 2:40 class, which brought out a purse of $300 for horses of the 2:40 class, which brought out purse of $300 for horses of the 2:40 class, which brought out seven competitors, five heats were required to decide the winner, who proved to be W. Basford's bay mare Carrie N., she taking the first, second, and fifth heats; and the race in 2:40, 2:36, 2:44, and J. Hornbeck's Nightingale the third and fourth heats in 2:39, 2:37. The other starters were Silas Rich, Dover, and Tom Ladin, Cameron, and Big Fellow, Dover, taking third money. On the 15th the attendance was largely increased, and the weather and track being favorable, good sport was witnessed. The first trot was for horses that had never beaten 2:50 at Rhinebeck, which had nine contestants, T. Graydy's gray gelding W. H. Arnold winning in five heats, of which A. Sammon's Happy Jack took the first in 2:36, but which Dropped dead in the "free-for-all" race on this track, Oct. 2, 1875. The monument stands on a terraced elevation, at one end of which a pedestal vase, filled with flowers, is placed, and a large hickory tree thrives in the shade near. At the position chosen by the artist is one showing the mare stripped of harness, standing at ease, with the head slightly turned on one side as if surveying the surroundings. Appropriate sentiments were made by Mr. F. H. Atkinson, president of the Association, and Mr. Alden Goldsmith.

TROTTING AT WAVERLY PARK, N. J.—There was a large assemblage of trotting men present at Waverly Park, near Newark, N. J., on Tuesday, June 13, to witness two purse races announced for decision. The first was for a purse of $150 for horses that had never beaten 2:50. It was won by D. Sandford's Flora in four heats, beating Dr. Heard's Annie R., J. Jarvis' Jennie, Peter Manee's Tilly Carson, S. Dunham's Fairy Land and T. Holden's Maud Holden. Annie R. won the first heat in 2:50¾, and Flora the next three heats and the race in 2:42, 2:42¾, 2:42¾. The second race was for a purse of $300, for horses that had never beaten 2:38, for which three out of the five horses entered came once the track. These were Peter Manee's Nellie V., Dr. Heard's Lizzie, Dr. Darlington's Brown Dick, E. Der don, Gray Billy won the first heat in 2:35½, and Nellie V. the three next and race in 2:35¾, 2:37¾, 2:42¾.

THE TRIGGER.

THE AMERICAN LONG-RANGE TEAM.

The closing competition for places on the American team which is to shoot in the long-distance international competitions at Creedmoor, L. I., this year, took place there on Tuesday and Wednesday, June 13, 14, fifteen of the eligible sixteen taking part, the absentee being T. H. Grey, who, being piqued by the action taken by the committee, declined to have anything further to do with shooting at these grounds. The weather on both days was exceedingly windy, the wind blowing from southward down the range along the line of fire. Col. W. B. Farwell was troubled with a sore hand—the right, which he had slightly lacerated and erysipelas had made inflamed in coming out ahead of his opponents on the first day, though falling off considerably on the second. The distances shot at were 800, 900 and 1,000 yards—twenty at the latter range and fifteen at each of the others—and the aggregate scores on each day were as follows:

W. B. Farwell	223	206
F. Hyde	217	212
T. S. Dakin	215	218
J. A. Fisher	213	214
L. Webber	213	217
N. Washburn	206	176
L. O. Brace	202	218
H. A. Shaffer	200	220

A. Anderson	200	204
C. E. Overbaugh	199	221
J. W. Jowell	194	210

RIFLE COMPETITIONS AT CREEDMOOR.—Two interesting fixtures attracted a numerous body of marksmen to Creedmoor, L. I., on Saturday, June 17. The first competition was for the Hepburn trophy, 800, 900 and 1,000 yards, fifteen shots at each range. The high wind, which blew unsteadily from the south, was not favorable, and under the circumstances the shooting was in the main very good. The scores made were as follows: E. H. Sanford, 60, 61, 64—185; A. J. Roux, 63, 61, 55—182; W. B. Farwell, 62, 56, 57—175; H. M. Elmendorf, 58, 57, 57—172; C. Dimon, 57, 58, 57—172; H. Fisher, 62, 49, 49—160; Isaac L. Allan, 52, 60, 45—157; H. S. Jewell, 60, 61, 37—158; A. V. Canfield Jr., 46, 52, 59—157; Dr. Darlington, 50, 56, 50—156; C. E. Overbaugh, 45, 56, 55—156; R. H. Madison, 49, 41, 43—132. The next contest was for The Spirit or the Times badge, for which there were thirty-nine competitors, each of whom fired two sighting and ten scoring shots, off-hand. The best scores were as follows: H. Fulton, 36; I. L. Allan, 35; W. B. Farwell, 33; C. E. Bydenburgh and C. C. Moore, 32; R. Higgins and J. F. W. Richards, 31; S. E. Valentine, E. H. Sanford and A. Anderson, 30; F. H. Holton, George Waterman and C. H. Eagle, 29.

THE AUSTRALIAN RIFLEMEN.—Advices from Sydney, N. S. W., inform us that the final competition for places on the team to take part, on behalf of the colony, in the international rifle matches at Creedmoor, took place April 28, the result being the selection of the following gentlemen, whose aggregate scores are given: Captain Smith, 626; Mr. Goe, 605; Mr. Lynch, 606; Ensign Maddocks, 601; Mr. Slade, 598. The other competitors and the following scores: Rice, 580; Rushelle, 572; Sellers, 572; Law, 570; Capt. Cooper, 564; Capt. Strong, 562; Capt. Compton, 550. The Sydney Echo says: "Capt. Smith has retained the premier position in the team by 20 points above any other competitor. He was top scorer in the intercolonial practices for 1874 and 1875; made the highest score with the Field and Henry rifles ever made this side of the line, and also made top score in the last intercolonial match he took part in, in 1867; in addition to which he has been twice top in the score in five competitions, once second, once third, and once fourth."

THE SCOTCH RIFLEMEN.—The Scots who aspire to be among those who are to try and secure for the land of their heather and thistle the honor of placing upon victory in the forthcoming international rifle competitions had another day's practice on the 14th, each man firing fifteen rounds, at 800, 900 and 1,000 yards respectively. The scores appear underneath. The highest attainable number of points being 225: Cleves, 180; Whitelaw, 178; Boyd, 173; McKerrell, 173; Rae, 173; Thorburn, 168; Gilmour, 165; Mitchell, 164; Burgess, 160; Clarke, 163; Paton, 162; Luke, 162; Campbell, 161; McVittie, 159; Duncan, 158; Fraser, 157; Menzies, 155; McInnes, 153; Findlay, 151; Smith, 146; Brewster, 146; McIntyre, 144; Watson, 141; Riddell, 134. The weather was bad, and there was a heavy gale while the men were shooting at long range.

THE SCOTT'S HEAD WHO SEE shoot at Wimbledon for the Hicho Shield this year are Clews, Boyd, Dunlop, Whitelaw, Rae, Ferguson, McVittie and Ross; Thorburn and McFerrell, subs.

MAST vs. WEST.

The first regular series of contests between the representative nines of the East and the West terminated June 17, on which day the four Western nines ended their first Eastern tour. The tour games began on May 23, and at the close of the first week the record showed that the respective clubs of the two sections had each won six games. Of earned runs and first-base hits the West had scored 18 earned runs and 125 base-hits, to 19 earned runs and 121 base-hits by the Eastern nines. At the end of the second week's play the West had won eight games to the East's four, the record of earned runs and base-hits being 16 and 131 for the West, to 14 and 104 for the East. The close of the third week left the record of won games again at six to six, that of earned runs being 16 and of base-hits 104 for the West, against 24 and 106 for the East. The close of the last week left the East victorious by 8 to 4 in won games, the record of earned runs and base-hits being 39 and 139 for the East and 31 and 133 for the West. The record of the week is appended:

Of the result of the tour it will be seen that the two sections come out exactly even, neither of the quartet having won more than the other. Individually Chicago leads the Western section, and Hartford the Eastern, the St. Louis and Mutual Clubs standing second, the Louisville being third and Cincinnati last on the Western side, and Boston second, Athletic third and Cincinnati fourth on the part of the East. The most remarkable falling-off in the play of the St. Louis nine after the McGeary trouble is noteworthy, the effect on Bradley apparently having been rather demoralizing, judging from the defeats sustained at the hands of the Hartford, New Haven and Chicago Clubs, six games being lost out of eight played after the St. Louis nine left the region of Philadelphia. The collapse of the Cincinnatis is to be regretted, as after their brilliant success in April it was expected that the contest between the two sections would have been evenly contested, as it has been thus far, the superiority of the other three Western nines compensating in a measure for the falling-off on the part of the Louisville. There will be tough work for the Hartfords to duplicate their successes of the past four weeks on the home grounds of the Western nines, and, as it is very questionable whether the Mutuals will win in either Chicago or St. Louis, the outlook at present is in favor of a victory for the West by the close of the first Western tour of the Eastern nines, which will occur July 15.

The models games of the tour are as follows. The record is limited to five runs for the winning nines:

STAR vs. BUCKEYE.

The finest game of ball ever played on the Buckeye grounds, at Columbus, O., was that between the Stars of Covington, Ky., and the Bucks, June 9. For the seventeenth time this season Barnie won the toss and sent the visitors to the bat. Fisher was followed by Martin and Barnes, they succeeded in scoring two runs in the first inning, which proved to be enough to win the game, as neither side scored during the remainder of the game. The Stars played an almost faultless fielding game, there being but one error charged against them.

CHICAGO vs. MUTUAL.

Fully four thousand people were gathered on the Union Grounds, Brooklyn, N. Y., on Saturday, June 17, to witness the last contest of the Chicago' eastern tour with the Mutual nine, it being the largest concourse of spectators seen on the grounds since July 4, 1875. The attraction was the splendid fielding of the Chicago nine as exhibited in their two previous contests, and the promise of another exciting and closely contested game given by the play of the Mutuals on the occasion of their victory on the previous Thursday. To the disappointment of the crowd, however, the Mutuals did not, as a whole, play up to the high mark of the two previous games, and the result was an easy triumph for the Chicago nine. Some plays were made in this contest which merit special remark, and a decision rendered by the umpire calls for comment by way of explaining the correct interpretation of one of the rules involved.

The game was commenced by the Mutuals, who scored an unearned run by a bad throw of Anson's to McVey, a base-hit by Hallinan, finely fielded by Hines, giving the run after Treacy had had a life given him by the Chicago side through a muff with a safe hit, and as White followed with a two-base hit an earned run was scored. From this time to the sixth inning the Mutuals were retired in very handsome style by the Chicagos for a series of blanks, splendid catches by Barnes, Hines, Glenn and Anson marking the play of the Whites on the field; one by Barnes, taken after a sharp run, with one hand, "bringing down the house" in the way of applause. Anson also took a hot liner neatly, and Hines a beauty of a fly to centre-field, the outfielding of Hines and Glenn in the three games was as masterly a display as we have ever seen, both playing without an error, their catching being clean and neat, their activity great, and their judgment of the batsmen excellent. The contest was close up to the third inning, at which time it stood at 2 to 1 only; but in the fourth the Whites settled the question of victory almost beyond dispute. Anson opened play in this inning with a hot liner to Nichols, who had had his finger hurt in the previous inning by a hot one from Beadle. Then Peters, Glenn, Spalding, McVey and Barnes made base-hits, as did White, though the latter was very nearly caught out by Treacy. It was not an error, however, though the slight chance for a catch was accepted. Peters, after earning his base, was caught napping by Hicks and Start, the former not being able to get back so quickly as Barnes can. Spalding's long high ball to the building struck one of the crowd in such a way as to rebound back to Booth's hands, the crowd making no effort to get out of the way of the ball. It was therefore claimed that the ball was "willfully stopped." In such a case the umpire should consider the ball as dead—as far as putting out a base-runner is concerned—until it is settled in the hands of the pitcher standing in his position. This Mr. Daniels did not do; for, though he inquired into the matter, he decided that the ball was not "willfully stopped." Booth took the ball from the crowd, threw it to Mathews near home base, and the latter passed it to Hicks, who put out Glenn on the play for dead ball. This and Peters' error in being caught off first base cost the Chicagos two additional earned runs, for seven base-hits were made in the inning, if not eight, for we are inclined to count Anson's hot liner missed by Nichols as a base-hit. The latter left Chicago, and from this time it may be said of the crowd that "the subsequent proceedings interested them no more," for it was all up with the Mutuals now, playing as the Chicago nine were. Afterwards an error by McVey in not stopping a ball thrown low from baseline distance by Peters gave the Mutuals a run in the sixth inning, and a palpable muff by Barnes in the ninth gave them another run. In the last five innings the Chicagos scored three more runs, all earned, three-baggers by Anson and Glenn being noteworthy. We must not forget to mention a beautiful stop made by Hallinan in the third inning in fielding a ball from Addy to Start. It was the perfection of short-field play. Hicks did not throw accurately in this game, nor did Craver play the position for all it was worth; in all other conditions the fielding was very good, especially that of Hallinan, Treacy and Start.

HARTFORD vs. LOUISVILLE.

The third meeting between the above League clubs occurred at Hartford, Ct., June 17, and resulted, as did the two preceding, in the success of the local club, who played a remarkably fine fielding game, committing not one error, and winning by a score of 2 to 0. The run scored was in the third inning by Bond, who reached first through Fulmer's error, and got second on Mills' clean base-hit. A hit by Allison sent him on to third, whence he came home on a weak hit by Burdock. In four innings the Hartfords went out as they came to the bat, the first three batsmen following suit in the eighth. The losing team likewise fielded grandly, but two errors being charged to them. The batting, however, was weak on both sides, and few plays that could be termed brilliant characterized the contest.

LIVE OAK vs. LOWELL.

Three times this season the Lowell, Mass., people, our correspondent have been obliged to swallow a bitter pill of bad umpiring, and in the game on June 13 the long-restrained indignation burst forth, and probably no umpire was ever "chinned" as Mr. Briggs was in this game. When it became generally known that the umpire had indulged in bets of two to one on the Live Oaks, quickly followed by several almost barefaced decisions, it looked for a while as though the crowd around him intended some violence, but their action by the strong management prevented anything more serious than cries of "Put him out," etc., from the excited crowd.

THE FUNERAL AT SEA.

BY H. J. FINN.

Deep mists hung over the mariner's grave,
When the holy funeral rite was read,
And every breath on the dark-blue wave
Seemed hushed, to hallow the friendless dead.
And heavily heaved on the gloomy sea
The ship that sheltered that homeless one—
As though his funeral-hour should be
When the waves were still, and the winds were gone.
And there he lay in his coarse, cold shroud,
And strangers were round the coffinless;
Not a kinsman was seen among that crowd,
Not an eye to weep, nor a lip to bless.
No sound from the church's passing-bell
Was echoed along the pathless deep;
The hearts that were far away, to tell
Where the mariner lies in his lasting sleep.
Not a whisper then lingered on the air;
Over his body one moment his messmates bent.
Then the plunging sound of the dead was there,
And the ocean is now his monument.
And many a sigh and many a tear
Shall be breathed, and shed, in the hours to come,
When the widow and fatherless shall hear
How he died, far, far, from his happy home.

MYRTILLE.

TRANSLATED FOR THE NEW YORK CLIPPER,
BY HENRY L. WILLIAMS.

Quite at the end of the village of Dosenheim, in Alsace, some thirty yards above the sandy path which leads into the forest, a pretty little dwelling stands amongst fruit-trees; its gable faces the valley, and large stones load its flat roof.

The pigeons go wheeling above it, the fowls seek worms under the hedgerows, and the cock perches on the little garden-wall to repeat all the reveille or "Co-ke-loo, Tom" for the amusement of the echoes of the Falberg. The linen dries on the wooden staircase leading up to the first floor, and a couple of vines clamber up the front, and spread out at the very edge of the roof.

Were you to ascend those steps, you would perceive, at the end of the narrow passage, the kitchen interior, full of flower-patterned dishes and deep soup-plates. Were you to open that door on the right, you would see into the vast hall, with antique oak furniture, a ceiling barred with huge browned beams, and an ancient Nuremberg clock, solemnly ticking.

Spinning and nursing, a woman sits there; she is in the prime of her seven-and-thirtieth year. She wears a long-bodied, black taffeta dress, and velvet cap with long, fluttering ribbons.

A man in a plush coat and maroon cloth breeches, with a broad, long forehead over his calm, thoughtful eyes, dances a puffy-faced boy on his knees as he whistles a cavalry-call.

Through the small windows the village can be seen at the bottom of the valley, as through a picture-frame; the rivulet leaping over the mill-dam and rushing across the wide winding street; old old houses, with sheds and shops, sheds and overhanging garret-windows, where the nets dry in the sun; the girls kneeling to wash on the stone edging of the riverside; the cattle watering and bellowing gravely amidst the tall willows; the boy herders cracking their whips; the mountain-tops, where the sharp pine steeples start up distinctly—all these things are mirrored in the moving water, which carries away brooks of ducklings or two or three rotten trees undermined from the banks.

On beholding these things, and being suitably affected, you would think: "Heaven is good! All that comes of Heaven is excellent, is perfect! Let us be thankful to it, and celebrate its mercies for ever and ever!"

Well, my dear reader, such was the abode of Bremer, and such were Bremer himself, his wife Catherine, and their son little Fritz, in the year of grace 1820.

I have described them all to you exactly as I have pictured them to myself.

Sebastian Bremer had served in the Chasseurs of the Imperial Guards.

After the campaign of 1815 he had married his old love, Catherine—a little too old, perhaps, though still hearty and full of gracefulness. With his own property, house, and four or five acres of vineyard, and the land coming with Catherine, Bremer was one of the leading burghers of Dosenheim. He might, therefore, have been mayor, deputy, or one of the town council; but he recked little of honors, and his sole pastime, once he was through with farm-work, was to take down his gun from the hooks in the kitchen, whistle for his dog Friedland, and be off for a stroll in the woods.

Now, it came to pass that the honest fellow, on one day coming home from hunting, brought back in his biggest game-bag a little gipsy girl, between two and three years of age, as nimble as a squirrel and as swarthy as a blackberry. He had picked her up in the sack of a hapless Bohemian woman, who had fallen dead at the foot of a tree with weariness, or maybe starvation.

I leave you to imagine the outcry and protests of Catherine. But, since Bremer was usually master in his own house, he merely told his wife that the little creature was going to be baptized under the names of Suzanne Rederique Myrtille, and be brought up with little Fritz.

It is needless to say that all the gossips and old crones of the village flocked to contemplate the little zingara, whose grave and precocioush thoughtful countenance amazed them.

"That's no child like others," cried they, "but a heathen—a downright pagan! You can see by its eyes that it already understands what is going on. She is listening to every word we say. Mind, Master Christian! all gipsies have crooked claws. When you rear eaglets, they kill your chickens some fine morning, and sail away up into the skies."

"Plague take you all!" returned Bremer, "and make you mind your own business. I have one Bible, you Israelite Jews, and Germans—some light, some dark, some red, some brown, some black—some with flat noses and some with hooked beaks—but everywhere, aye, everywhere, I have found honest souls in every race."

"Oh, yes, yes, yes, that's very likely," answered the dames, but those people live under roofs, while the gipsies camp out in the open air."

"Bah! be off," said he, showing them politely to the door by the shoulders; "be off with you; I have no need of your advice. It is time to freshen up the air of the farm, clear out the stables, and wash the floors."

Nevertheless, the gossips were not entirely mistaken, as was, unfortunately, made manifest about twelve years later.

As much as Fritz liked to feed the cattle, take the horses to water, follow his father into the fields to labor—sowing, reaping, mowing, sheaf-binding and harvesting—so much did Myrtille dislike to milk the cows, churn butter, shell peas, and peel potatoes.

When the girls of Dosenheim—all being at the water-side to wash together—called her "the heathen!" she would complacently look at herself in the water, and, smiling at her lovely black hair, her ruddy lips, white teeth, and necklace of wild berries, she would murmur:

"They call me a heathen, it is because I am uncommonly pretty."

And then, with the tip of her little foot, she would dash the water about amidst her peals of laughter.

Catherine, who noticed all that occurred, complained bitterly.

"Myrtille is good for nothing," she would say; "she will do no work at all. It is all in vain that I preach, advise and reprove her—she always does everything the wrong way. Only the other day, when we were packing away apples in the store-room, did she not bite the nicest ones to see if they were fully ripe? Her greatest talent is shown in stealing—nothing else can be laid to her charge."

Bremer himself could not help acknowledging that an outlandish spirit was in her, and when he heard his wife crying out from morning to night: "Myrtille, Myrtille, I say, where are you? Oh, the little wretch has run away to pick brambleberries again!" he would laugh to himself and think:

"Poor hen once more! she is like the hen with the duck's eggs; the ducklings are in the water, and you flutter around them and call away, and they no more mind you than if you were egging them on."

Every year, after the crops had been got in, Fritz and Myrtille would spend entire days far from the farm in wending the lands, singing, and thinking of the potatoes in hot ashes, and not coming down the rocky hillside till the bark horn called them home.

These were Myrtille's red-letter days. Seated by the fire of refuse wood, with her pretty, brown face in the hollow of her hand, she would remain unmoving for full half an hour, lost in holy, profound reverie. She seemed to be saddened to the very depths of her soul by the sight of the lines of wild geese and ducks crossing, at the end of Autumn, that vacant sky which stretched from one mountain to another above the huge trees. She would watch them with a long, long gaze, till they had vanished in the nothingness, and then she would abruptly leap to her feet, and cry as she unfolded her arms:

"I must go. I must go away. Oh, I must go!"

Then she would weep, with her head bowed down in her lap, and Fritz, who wept also as he stood beside her, would say:

"Why do you cry, Myrtille? Who has caused you grief? Is it a boy of the village—Kaspar, Wilhelm or Heinrich? Only let me know, and I'll settle them. Tell me the name?"

"No."

"But why do you weep?"

"I cannot tell."

"Would you like to climb the Falberg!"

"No; it is not far enough."

"But wherever do you want to go, Myrtille?"

"Yonder, yonder," said she, pointing to the horizon, "where the birds disappear."

Fritz would then lift up his eyes and stare agape.

On one September day, when they were similarly loitering at the skirts of the forest, about noon the heat was so great and the air so still that the smoke of their little fire, instead of rising like a gray pillar, spread about like water, under the dried brambles. The grasshopper had suspended its monotonous chirp; not one insect buzzed, not one leaf rustled, and not a bird twittered. With closed eyelids and legs well tucked in under their flanks, the cattle slumbered in the shade of a tall oak in the centre of the meadow, the dull, deep, slow and plaintive "moo" of one of them now and then being heard.

Fritz had set to work braiding a whiplash; but by degrees he had given that task over and stretched himself out on the grass, with his hat pulled over his eyes, and Friedland lying beside him and yawning from ear to ear.

Myrtille alone did not seem to yield to the oppressive heat. She crouched immovably by the fire, with her arms hugging her knees, in the full blaze of the sun, while her large black eyes wandered amidst the gloomy colonnades of the woodland.

Time crept slowly on. The distant village-clock had struck twelve, past one, then two—but the gipsy girl never stirred. A deep and mysterious sensation appeared to be inspired in her by those woods, arid hill-tops, rocks, and rows of pine-trees leading the mountain-side.

"Yes, yes," she said to herself; "I have seen all this before; a long time ago—oh, very long!"

All of a sudden, glancing at Fritz, who slept with all the weight and calm of youth, she rose noiselessly and started away. Her light feet hardly grazed the sward as she ran on and on and ascended the slope. Friedland turned his head leisurely, and made as if to rise and follow her; but then he laid himself down anew, as if overcome with laziness.

Myrtille had vanished in the thicket of briars fringing the forest. With one leap she crossed the muddy ditch, where a lonely frog fattened in the reeds, and in twenty minutes had reached the top of Hollow Rock, whence may be descried the bluish summits of the Vosges Mountains and the country of Alsace.

There she turned, to see if anyone was following her; but Fritz, with his hat still over his eyes, was so sound asleep as ever in the middle of the broad green meadow, with Friedland and the cows under the tree. Farther on she saw the village, the river, the farm-house roof, where the pigeons fluttered as tiny as swallows in the distance, the long, winding street, where a few red petticoats were walking to and fro, and the little moss-grown church, where the good Cure Nicklausse had baptized her and confirmed her in the Christian faith.

And when she had beheld all this, she turned her again to the mountain, to admire the innumerable spear-points of the firs huddled together on the brink of the chasms, as grass is clumped together in the pastures.

Face to face with this grand sight, the gipsy felt her bosom expand, her heart beat with unknown force, and, resuming her flight, she rushed into a cleft carpeted with moss and broom to gain the cowpath through the woods.

Her whole soul and all her savage nature shone in her gaze with incredible power; she was transfigured; her little hands grappled the creepers and vines, while her naked feet hooked into the fissures of the stones. Speedily she dropped down on the other side of the mountain, running and leaping, or perhaps stopping short now and then to look at the surrounding objects—a tree, or ravine, an isolated pool, or a patch of clearing full of luxuriant, sweet herbs—as if stupor-stricken.

Though she well knew that she had never before beheld these sticks and stones, she cried out to herself at every turn of the path:

"I know it. That tree was there—and yonder that rock—and there is the torrent beneath them!" Though a thousand strange reminiscences, like so many visions, appeared in her mind with the celerity of lightning, she could not understand it, and could not account for it. She had never yet reached the point of saying:

"Fritz and the rest of them can be happy in the village, with meadows and farms and orchard-fruit and milch-cows and fowls, meat and meal from cellar and store-house, and a warm room in winter. But I do not care a pin for such things, being a heathen—an undeniable heathen. I was born in the green forest, and the same as the squirrel on the oak-top, the falcon on the peak, and the thrush on the pine-tree."

No; she had never reflected upon such matters, but instinct had guided her; and hence it was that this strange impulse drove her to the cleared plateau of the Charcoal-burners' Resort (Koule-plats), where the gipsies who pass through Alsace into Lorraine commonly stop to spend the night and hang their soup-pot amongst the heather.

It was sunset. Myrtille sat herself down at the foot of a tree, tired out, with lacerated feet, and her red petticoat equally in tatters, from contact with thorn and bramble.

For a long while she dwelt motionless, staring into vacancy, and listening to the wind soughing in the tree-tops—happy, quite happy, at being alone in that boundless solitude.

Night fell. Out came the stars by myriads in the darksome depths of the sky; then the moon arose, and her limpid beams delicately silvered the scattered birch-trees on the mountain-side.

Sleep began to overcome the young gipsy, and she was nodding, when from afar off in the woods the shouting of many voices startled her. She listened and recognized those voices; Bremer's, Fritz and all the farm-laborers were out on the search for her.

Thereupon, without hesitation, Myrtille dashed deeper into the woods, stopping only after long runs to listen. The calls died away. And presently she could hear nothing save her heart thumping in her breast and respired right at a less rapid pace.

At length, when the moon had ceased to enlighten the foliage, unable to lift a foot, she sank down on the heather and fell asleep. She was then four leagues from Dosenheim, near the springs of the Zinsel, where Bremer's searchings could hardly be pushed.

It was broad daylight when she awoke in the wilderness of the Schlossberg, under an old moss-grown tree. A thrush was warbling above her, and another was making answer afar off in the valley. The leaves were shivering in the morning breeze, though the air was already warmed and laden with a thousand odors of vervain, vines, mosses, and wild flowers.

The young wanderer opened her eyes in wonder; she stared about her, until, remembering that she would never more hear Catherine cry out: "Myrtille! Myrtille! where are you, you little hussey?" she smiled and listened to the thrush. Near her a spring was bubbling forth; she had but to turn her head to see the water spurt out of the rocks and spread among the grass. Above the stone an arbute tree hung down, with bunches of red grapes.

Myrtille was thirsty, but she felt so lazy and so well satisfied with the mere listening to the water trickling and the bird singing, that she had not the heart to disturb the harmony, but let her brown head hang back, smiling and eyeing the daylight from between her half-closed lids.

"This is the life I shall always lead henceforth," she thought. "I do not see that I am to blame for being so indolent. Heaven created me of this way of thinking." Whilst thus musing, she pictured the farm, with the cock and hens, and the eggs hidden in the barn under the straw.

"If I only had a couple of eggs," continued she, "two hard-boiled ones like Fritz had in his satchel yesterday, with a crust of bread and some salt, I should be happy. But, tush! when a body is out of eggs, mulberries and blackberries do as well."

A perfume of wild-fruit at the same moment made her pretty nostrils dilate.

"Aha!" said she, "there are some berries close by, I'll be bound."

It was no mistake, for they grew thick on the brambles.

In a moment or two, as the thrush had ceased to sing, she rose on her elbow and perceived it digging into one of the arbute-berry clusters. She went to drink a few drops of water caught in her hand, and noticed that cresses were plenty on that spot, and there came to her mind a thing the like of which had never occurred to her before—a certain discourse of Cure Nicklausse, to wit:

"Consider the fowls of the air, for they sow not, neither do they reap, which neither have storehouse, nor barn, yet your heavenly Father feedeth them!"

"Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow: they toil not, neither do they spin; and yet I say unto you that even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these."

"If, then, God so feed the birds and so clothe grass of the field, how much more will He clothe you, O ye of little faith!

"Therefore, take no thought of these things, for the Gentiles seek after them. Does not your Heavenly Father know what it is whereof you have need?"

"Ah!" thought Myrtille, "when Mother Catherine called me a heathen I ought to have answered her: 'It is you who are the unfaithful and pagans, for you sow and reap; and we are the good Christians, since we live like the fowls of the air.'"

She had barely finished this train of thought before a patter of footsteps on the dry leaves made her lift her head. She was about to hear those steps again, when a gipsy lad, some eighteen or twenty years of age, tall and slender, dark, with curly hair, brilliant eyes, and thick lips, slid down the rock and cried out, as he stared at her with admiration:

"Almani!"

"Almani!" answered Myrtille, greatly affected.

"Oh, are you?" said the youth. "Of whose band?"

"I don't know. I was looking for one."

And without parley or break she related to the stranger how Bremer had brought her up, and how she had run away from home the night before. He laughed and showed his teeth.

"I am going to Hazlach," said he, pointing, "for all our band will be at the merrymaking there tomorrow: Pfeifer Karl, Metchior the Blue Tomtit, Fritz the clarionet-player, Cuckoo Peter and the Black Pie. The women tell fortunes, whilst we men play music. If you like, you can come with me."

"I do, indeed, like it!" rejoined Myrtille, casting down her eyes.

Thereupon he kissed her, put his satchel on her back, and, taking his walking-staff in both hands, sang out:

"Woman, on art mine! Thou shalt bear my sack, and I'll see you fed. Step out!"

And Myrtille, though so lazy on the farm, marched sturdily forward. He had followed her with a song, and walking as often on his hands as his heels, he was so topsy-turvy with delight.

Since that day no one ever heard any news of Myrtille. It was nearly the death of Fritz when it was said that she would not return; but he became reconciled to his loss when he wedded, some years later, Gredel Dick, the miller's daughter, a good-hearted, lovable, plump, relishable girl. Catherine appeared then to be quite satisfied, for Gredel Dick was the best match in the village.

Bremer alone remained unconsoled, for he loved Myrtille like his own child, and at last he fell ill of repining.

One Winter's day, when he had risen and was looking out of the window, he saw a gipsy woman in tatters crossing the valley, with a sack on her back, through the deep snow. He sank into a chair with a long sigh.

"What ails you, Bremer?" inquired his wife.

As he made no answer, she went to him, and then perceived that he was dead.

OLYMPIC CLUB OF SAN FRANCISCO.

The Spring athletic sports of the Olympic Club were held at San Francisco, Cal., May 13. The delay in the reception of the following official report was caused by the length of time occupied by the judges in coming to a conclusion in regard to the mile race. The club having had the track (which is a little short of a third of a mile) put in good order, fast time was anticipated; but the day turned out most unfavorable, the wind blowing a perfect hurricane and the clouds of dust making it very uphill work for the runners and most disagreeable for the spectators, of whom there were, nevertheless, a large number present, including many ladies. Great interest was manifested in the various events, showing that the efforts of the club in promoting athletic sports in that city are meeting with success. Appended are the full returns:

100-yards race, running start of 5 yards—A. Prinz, 1; A. S. Thompson, 2; M. F. La Grange, 3; M. C. Whyte, 0; C. T. Wilson, 0. Prinz jumped off with the lead, and, keeping it the whole way, won by half a yard. Time, 10sec.

Running high jump—M. F. La Grange, 5ft. 1in., 1; R. G. McMillan, 4ft. 9in., 2; A. Prinz, 3.

440-yards race, for club challenge medal—A. S. Thompson (holder), 1; G. M. Robinson, 2; M. C. Whyte, 3. Thompson led from the start. At about half way Robinson made an attempt to pass him, but Thompson went away easily, and won as he pleased. Time, 57¾sec.

Running wide jump—M. F. La Grange, 18ft. 9in., 1; A. Prinz, 18ft. 8¾in., 2; C. R. Browne, 18ft. 1¾in., 3. This was a very close contest between La Grange and Prinz, the former winning after a tie at 18ft. 8¾in. by half an inch.

Putting heavy weight, 302—W. M. Kerr, 29ft. 10¾in., 1; W. S. Smith, 25ft. 9in., 2; A. S. Thompson, 0; C. R. Browne, 0; A. L. Balmer, 0; G. M. Robinson, 0.

Standing wide jump, with weights—W. S. Lawton, 12ft. 6¾in., 1; A. S. Thompson, 11ft. 10in., 2; A. Prinz, 11ft. 3in., 3; M. F. La Grange, 0. After several attempts, all over 12ft., Lawton succeeded in making the above splendid winning jump.

One-mile race—G. M. Robinson, 0; W. Davidson, 0; C. R. Browne, 0; G. W. Roche, 0; M. C. Whyte, 0. Robinson ran the distance in 5min. 5¾sec., but, owing to a collision with Davidson, a claim of foul was made, and the judges being unable to decide where the fault lay, declared the race off.

Putting light weight, 16lb.—W. S. Smith, 32ft. 5½in., 1; A. L. Balmer, 30ft. 8in., 2; A. S. Thompson, 0; C. R. Browne, 0.

Three standing jumps—W. S. Lawton, 35ft. 9in., 1; A. S. Thompson, 0; M. F. La Grange, 0.

One-mile walk—G. M. Robinson, 1; J. R. Fulton, 2; D. Germain, 3. G. M. Robinson led, and, at two a couple of yards. Time, 6min. 10½sec.

Throwing baseball—W. S. Smith, 95¼yds., 1; C. S. Neal, 89yds., 2; M. F. La Grange, 0; W. H. Burlington, 0; O. W. Dyckman, 0.

Running hop, step and jump—A. Prinz, 36ft. 11in., 1; M. F. La Grange, 36ft., 2; A. S. Thompson, 0; R. G. McMillan, 0. The hardness of the ground here made good records impossible.

220-yards hurdle race, over 10 hurdles—M. F. La Grange, 1; C. R. Browne, 2; M. C. Whyte, 0. Time, 31sec. This being the first attempt at hurdle-racing accounts for the slowness of the time.

Three-mile race—W. Davidson, 1; G. M. Robinson, 2; R. G. McMillan, 3; G. W. Roche, 0. The four kept well together until the seventh lap, when Roche dropped out, and McMillan commenced to fall behind. From this Davidson took the lead, and was over 300 yards from the finish post on a splendid spurt, and won easily by that. Time, 17min. 34sec., which against the strong wind may be considered good time. Judges, C. A. Bennet, T. C. Marrum, and C. R. Rossiter. Starter, Jos. O'Connor.

CUPID'S FOIBLES, FOLLIES AND FANCIES.

SOOTHE MY HEART.

WRITTEN FOR THE NEW YORK CLIPPER
BY LIEUT. E. H. KELLOGG.

Eyes like flashing scrolite,
Form as fair as Aphrodite,
Hair's jetty raven hue—
Who could fail to worship you?
For thy color comes and goes
Like the sunshine on the rose,
While thy pulsing heart is heard
Fluttering like a frightled bird.

And a buoyant, airy light
Thrills me with intense delight,
As thy bosom heaves to mine,
While your arms my neck entwine.
Fragrant zephyrs from the south
Linger o'er thy dewy mouth;
When I feel that balmy breath,
I would breathe it though 'twere death.

For I know those lips contain,
A sweetness for each pain;
Hurled on man as punishment
By a Power Omnipotent.
Thou art beauteous, thou art true,
All my hopes are wrapt in you.
Darling, darling, thou art mine,
And my heart is solely thine.

HOW THE YOUNG GENTILE FOOLED THE MORMON BISHOP.

A short time since a young Gentile paid his attention to the daughter of a Mormon bishop at Franklin, but was warned away, and even threatened by the Danite Band. The young man was not to be scared so long as the girl was willing, and finally they concluded to get married, end their troubles, and spite the old man. But who would do the splicing, was the question. They couldn't find anyone in Franklin willing to undertake the task; so the young man remembered an old bishop in a stake of Zion this side of Franklin, and to him the couple went, the first arming himself with a certificate in the shape of a bottle of good old whisky, for which he knew the bishop had a weakness, the young man and the girl lit out between days, and were soon in the presence of the bishop who was to be prevailed upon to do the splicing. The young man, after producing the persuasive bottle, told the bishop that he was a good brother of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, and the girl by his side was a Gentile. "Take a drink, bishop." The bottle went up, and the whiskey went down.

"You see, bishop," continued the young man, "this girl's father is a d—d Gentile, and is opposed to our marrying; so we just come down to get you to do the little job for us. Take a drink, ibishop." And the bishop took an eager pull, while the young man continued: "This d—d Gentile threatened to shoot us on sight if we married; but we don't care a cuss for that. Bishop, take a drink." The bishop took a swig and warmed up to business. After marrying, he gave them the usual Mormon advice; and made some allusion to Utah's best crop. Crimson suffused the damsel's cheek, the young man stood two feet taller in his boots, and the bishop took another drink. Being of one flesh, they set out to find lodgings for the night at the house of a neighboring hotel. The sweetest dreams are often disturbed; so were those of the newly-wedded pair. There came a knocking, ungentle knocking, at the chamber-door, and the voice of the old man rang out on the air, demanding admission.

"You can't come in!" yelled the young man, "until morning!" and repeat.

But the father kept up the knocking, and the young man, becoming annoyed, got up and let him in.

"What are you doing in that bed, you nasty thing?" said he, addressing the new wife.

"Look here, dad, I'm just doing what mam did when she married you. I'm sleeping with my husband, and I'll trouble you to leave me alone."

The old man didn't go; he tarried, talked, scolded and threatened until the young man's passion rose.

"See here, bishop, dad, that's my wife, and you can't abuse her. Vamose, or I'll blow your brains out;" and as he said it, he swung a savage six-shooter out of his pocket, and the old man watted not on the order, but went, leaving the young couple alone in their sweetness. The hero and heroine of this story were persecuted by the Saints, and finally left the country, settling among their friends in a small town on the Central Pacific west of Ogden.—Salt Lake (Utah) Tribune.

A MOTHER'S LONG SEARCH for Husband and Children.

In the Supreme Court of Brooklyn, before Judge Gilbert, Richard Baker and his wife Maria confronted each other in a legal struggle for the possession of their children, a boy of 10 and a girl of 13. The mother has been in search of the children for the last five years. Baker and she were married in London fifteen years ago. He was a prosperous merchant then, but failed in 1869, and sought to induce his wife to assign him a portion of a large amount of property which she had in her own name. On her refusal he began abusing her. She applied for a legal separation and for the custody of the children, Margaret V. Baker and Lesy Fowler Baker, on the ground of cruelty, neglect, and wrongful treatment on the part of her husband. She charged him, among other things, with intimacy with one Jessie McPherson, at Brighton, England, and with Sophie Kemp, the children's governess. The High Court of Chancery in July, 1870, granted a decree of separation, and subsequently gave the mother the care of the children. Baker afterwards kidnapped them from her, and disappeared with them, with their governess. He left no trace as to where he was taking the children, and it was not until recently that Mrs. Baker ascertained that her husband and Miss Kemp were living in Brooklyn. She found Miss Kemp keeping a fashionable boarding-house at Washington and Concord streets. Mrs. Baker employed counsel, and through them obtained an order for the production of the children in court. The mother and son met on Tuesday night for the first time since the abduction. She kissed and hugged the child, and could scarcely tear him from her than an hour. The little fellow was taken to court by Deputy-sheriff Hardy. The runaway husband was present, and Judge Gilbert, after hearing both sides of the case, adjourned it until this morning, in order that the daughter, who is at boarding-school in Morrisania, may be produced in court. The boy was directed to take charge of the boy, and to allow both parents to see him in reasonable hours. Mr. Baker denies his relationship to Miss Kemp, and says that she has acted the part of a mother towards the children. He says that his trouble with his wife arose out of his insisting on the discharge of a servant. Baker is said to have brought considerable money from London, and to have lost it here.—*N. Y. A KENTUCKY GIRL SERVES OUT A SLANDERER.

We are informed that a pitched battle was fought in the Sunday-school at Holt's School-house on the Lovelaceville road, about fifteen and a half miles from Paducah, on Sunday, which for a time created considerable commotion, and resulted in the severe injury of a young man known as "Step-John Rudolph," by a young lady named Miss Melissa Collier. It appears that Rudolph is a very longtongued individual, and that he had slandered Miss Collier, who is considered a young lady of excellent standing in that community, which fact he was at the Sunday-school above mentioned, and being exasperated beyond measure, she armed herself with a hickory club and entered the house crying. The superintendent was just about to begin reading a chapter in the Bible when he was interrupted by the exclamation of "Where is the scoundrel?" The whole school looked up in utter amazement, and discovered the lady making toward the corner where Rudolph was seated, with desperation in her eyes. Swinging her club as she approached Rudolph, she was heard to say: "Oh, here he is!" and whack went the shillalah upon his head, giving him a severe blow, by one of sufficient force to knock him over on the bench. Being in a corner, he could not get out handily, and Miss C. seized the club with both hands and gave him a terrible beating over the head, body and his arm, which he held forward for protection. The superintendent endeavored to hold the young lady back, and prevent her from killing Rudolph, but he could do nothing with her, and not till further assistance came could she be taken away from the object of her hatred. Rudolph's arm was very badly hurt. He employed Governor King to assist Mr. Samuel Bryce, County-attorney, in prosecuting the case, and the affair came off before Squire Emmett Lo. Rudolph, resulting in a fine of one cent and costs against the young lady. Step-John Rudolph was fined $5.—Paducah (Ky.) News.

A DAUGHTER MARRIES HER MOTHER'S AFFIANCED.

At 9 o'clock on Monday night a closed carriage drove up to the Police Central Office, and Detectives Ferris and Williamson handed out two well-dressed ladies, who, having been taken before Inspector McDermott, told the following story: Mrs. Augusta Fraser, the mother, now of 615 First avenue, was formerly an actress of great personal attractions. Her husband died two years ago, leaving their only child, Augusta Frazer, 17 years of age, in her mother's care. Among Mrs. Fraser's friends was a Mr. W. H. Fisher, a wealthy retired merchant of Forty-sixth street and Fifth avenue, who took a deep interest in the widow and her daughter. Some months ago he proposed to Mrs. Frazer, and was accepted, and then, previous to fulfilling her engagement, she went to Europe to settle up some property. Mrs. Fraser left her daughter under the care of some friends at 615 First avenue.

In the mother's absence Mr. Fisher called repeatedly upon the daughter, and, becoming infatuated, proposed to her. Augusta Frazer accepted Mr. Fisher's offer, and to escape her mother's friends went to live with a family named White, at Forty-seventh street and Ninth avenue. Mrs. Frazier returned from Europe two weeks ago, and was unable to find her daughter. None of her friends knew whither her daughter had gone, and, apprehensive that her daughter had been abducted, Mrs. Frazer called upon Superintendent Walling, and he detailed Detectives Ferris and Williamson to make an investigation. They followed Mr. Fisher to Mr. White's house, and learning that Miss Frazier was secreted there, they arrested her. A reconciliation was effected between mother and daughter yesterday. The mother renounced all claim to the affections of Mr. Fisher in favor of her daughter, and a wedding is at hand.—N. Y. Sun.

AN ENGLISH SOCIAL SCANDAL.—The English papers are excited over a singular story of domestic infelicity. An officer of the Guards married a beautiful young lady. The happy pair spent their honeymoon in Paris, and returned to fashionable quarters in London. But while the husband seemed proud of his young wife, he was not perfectly happy, and spent much of his time away from her, and she developed an extraordinary fondness for flirting, and even visited one gentleman at his room in the evening. The husband applied for a divorce, but the wife proved her innocence, and that she was married only in name and by law, and he was nonsuited. But the Judge took occasion to administer a severe rebuke to the lady, and over her head to others who are guilty of the same folly. He said that of late years there has been an alarming increase of flirting among ladies who ought to know better, and be in better households, and who, although stopping short of criminal conduct themselves, encouraged practices which are dangerous to society and prejudicial to good morals.

WASPS AND PRETTY GIRLS.—Some young ladies, on retiring to their bedroom Sunday evening, opened the window and saw a wasp's nest outside in the upper corner of the casing, and, not knowing what it was, thought to knock it off would be proper, and proceeded so to do. What was their surprise and horror, a moment after, to hear a dozen or more wasps buzzing around them. They were not in a condition to be "buzzed," neither were they prepared to run down-stairs, where their parents had company; but no other choice was left them, so down the stairs they rushed, followed by the uniformed guests. The company arose in fright as the two apparitions from the upper regions put in an appearance, and a general stampede took place in that parlor, and—well, the girls slept in the "spare" room that night, and the company went home and dreamed of beautiful bob-goblins.—Elsader (Iowa) Journal.

BONES TELLS ABOUT MISS NITRO-GLYCERINE.

TAMBO.—Say, Bones, kin you tell me why a set ub printers' quoins am like a pair ub corsets?

BONES.—Dat am beyond my comperhension.

TAMBO.—Well, a set ub printers' quoins am like a pair ub corsets bekase dey am used to lock up forms.

BONES.—Ub corse't is. But kin you tell me why a pair ub corsets am like a watch-dog?

TAMBO.—Bekase dey am fastened tight.

BONES.—Sumfin like it, but it ain't it; a pair ub corsets am like a watch-dog bekase dey am fastened tight by day, and let loose at night.

TAMBO.—You must er been to school permiskusly lately. Now, do you know why a bevar hat am like guanno?

BONES.—Gub it up.

TAMBO.—Well, dey both am a fur-tile top dressin'.

BONES.—Uh, uh. Dat puts me in mind ub a friend ub mine who christened his daughter Nitro-Glycerine.

TAMBO.—What for?

BONES.—Why, he said it would make her go off easier when she arrives at a marriageable age.

TAMBO.—Just so, it's the right chap struck her.

BONES.—Well, it come to pass putty much as de old man had 'ticipated—de gal grew to de years ub muturity, and in de course ub time a lover came and set in de parlor until "de wee small hours," as de poet sez. One night he remained later dan usual, and de mornin' were dawnin' as he was 'bout to leave. Well, as he was about to open de front door he met de charmin' mother ub his adored. "I'll show you de door, young man," she said, somewhat "spersely;" "aint you feard dat your mother'll be worried at your early hours?" "Oh, don't trouble yourself," said de young man blandly: "I can easily find it myself." "Oh, nonsense," replied the good ole lady; "it aint de slightest trouble. I shall be most glad to show you out," and she h'isted him lively wid a broomstick, and now he 'lows dat he's puffectly satisfied—dat if de daughter's temper is at all like her mother's, she'd blow anyone up dat she didn't like higher dan her namesake, ebery day in de week.

TAMBO.—Guess dat ole woman must er been de one I heard 'bout in Souf Carolina. She went into a store to get weighed, and raised de bar 215 pounds' weight, and her fair daughter went seventy pounds better.

BONES.—Go long!—I hear you raised a bar wus dan dat de odder day.

TAMBO.—How was dat?

BONES.—Why, I hear you took a drink, and, refusin' to pay, you raised de barkeeper.

Guard and Bless My Little One.

Oh, how swiftly time is flying!
Low and lower sinks life's sun
Angels, listen! I am dying—
Guard and bless my little one.

Angels, listen! When I leave her,
When my voice from earth has flown,
More than I will you'll grieve for her,
Wondering, watching here alone;
Often o'er my pillow leaning
She will wait with quivering breath—
Angels, keep from her the meaning
Of the sleep that we call death.
Chorus.—Oh, how swiftly time is flying! etc.

When my loving presence needing,
Life seems much of joy to lack;
When to prayerful words of pleading
There shall come no answer back,
Who will hush her young heart's sighing?
Who will shelter or befriend?
Angels, listen! I am dying—
Guard and bless her to life's end.
Chorus.—Oh, how swiftly time is flying! etc.

SILVERY RIPPLES KISS THE BANKS,

BY JOHN H. PORTER.

Silvery ripples kiss the banks
Where murmuring brooklets flow,
And wild flowers nod their lovely heads
When balmy zephyrs blow;
The opening buds the dew-drops drink
That on their petals lay;
While carols sweet from downy throats
Proclaim the opening day.

In grandeur from the eastern gate
Appears the king of day,
And lips with gold each bud and leaf
That bloom and fade by;
From bower'd grove and woodland dale
The cooing dove is heard;
While butterflies, with gaudy wings,
Vie with the humming-bird.

Thus my soul with transport feels
The magic touch and power,
As I with joy each splendor view
In life's

cue. It is useless to follow this game further. Even admitting that, as we urged last week, Slosson has not the strength to play a 600-point game, there is still no valid excuse for his losing this game. Having scored more than half of it when his antagonist had made out 38, it was his clear policy to make Garnier give him substantially the remainder of his points. Instead of swerving over 22, Garnier's average should not have been 12. With that run of 311 confronting him, Garnier would not, against any player but Slosson, have ever reached 250 points, whether his antagonist aimed boldly at winning quickly, or aimed at safety. Defensive tactics would have enabled Slosson to recover strength. He never even called for an intermission, yet frequently had he lamented that he had not, in playing Rudolphe and Garnier the week before, asked for an intermission in order to recuperate, and he promised himself that he would have an intermission when he again played Garnier. The latter deserved great credit when he pulled up some 200 points in his game of the Tuesday night before, because he was then playing against a strong man—Rudolphe. His de-serves comparatively little credit for having beaten Slosson, for he was opposing one who, ignoring every mode of procedure by which he could make victory sure, put forth no greater effort than his own peculiarly feeble play. All that the plainest common sense required of Slosson was that he should try not to play, while taking care that his antagonist should have no chance to play. Instead of this, there was not a safety stroke in the game. Without expressing any opinion as to what Sexton and Slosson are capable of doing ordinarily, they should have won first and second prizes in this tournament. As the balls ran, Slosson should have beaten both Rudolphe and Garnier the week before, in which event Sexton would never have lost a game. Slosson could not have made the weight of a deciding game against Sexton, and Sexton, knowing that his game with Slosson on Monday would be a decisive one, would not have gone to Rockaway on Sunday and made himself sick. A little headwork would have given Slosson second prize, common prudence would have given Sexton the first, and Rudolphe would have got third. There ought not to have been a tie, and the four players should have stood—Sexton, three games won; Slosson, two won and one lost; Rudolphe, one won and two lost; Garnier, none won. The Centennial is a good year for American players, even at the French game. But they must exhibit tact. Manual dexterity is not enough. Averages—Garnier, 22.6-27; Slosson, 20.21-26. Referee, John F. Glesson.

As all four of the contestants played an extra game, and therefore stand upon a perfect equality, it may be as well to sum up the "grand averages" of the eight games. Garnier's is 17.101-121 in 2,158 points, Rudolphe's 16.112-136 in 2,288 points, Slosson's 15.14-151 in 2,279 points, and Sexton's 14.70-125 in 1,820 points. The grand average of the tournament proper is 14.358-433 in 6,420 points; of the eight games, 15.450-533 in 8,445 points. The grand average of all the players in the Philadelphia tournament, itself so far ahead of all predecessors, was 15.167-2019 in 21,947 points. The grand average of the four players who played in this was 13.484-713 in 9,753 points in Philadelphia. Had the floor been steady, fancy can scarcely conceive what these four players would have done in Irving Hall.

Centennial Fourth of July.

CORRESPONDENTS are respectfully and urgently requested to mail their letters and reports for the week preceding the FOURTH OF JULY so as to reach here not later than Saturday, July 1, as THE CLIPPER, No. 14, will be published earlier than usual, so as to avoid coming out on our Centennial anniversary, and to give all connected with its publication and distribution an opportunity to participate in the festivities of the nation's Centennial birthday.

CHICAGO vs. MUTUAL.

The largest assemblage of spectators seen on the Union Grounds, Brooklyn, N. Y., this month, was gathered there on June 13, to witness the first of the series of games played by the Chicago and Mutual nines together this season. Heavy rain had fallen the night before, but the ground was nevertheless in fair condition for play, the previous dry weather having rendered it thirsty enough to absorb all the water that fell. The crowd included plenty of new faces, people who last year only went to see the "reliable Bostons" play, this year specially patronizing the now leading Chicagos. For half an hour before the game began the Chicago nine exercised in passing the ball around, the bases being manned, and each player in his position. No "fungo" batting was indulged, all the practice being devoted to fielding. Under such a system, it is not surprising that the Chicago nine at the head of the list in skillful fielding. The assemblage was not slow to perceive that in the play of the Chicagos and in their department and manner of doing their work there was the plain mark of discipline. The team is well handled, Spalding having already shown himself to be an admirable and intelligent manager, as well as an able captain of a nine. After their triumphant march through Hartford, Boston and Philadelphia, one defeat in the former city alone checking their career of success, it was not expected that any rebuffs would be met with at the hands of the Mutuals. Still a close and exciting game was expected, and none were disappointed, for the play of the Mutuals was such as to bring out the full strength of the Chicago nine to insure victory.

THE GAME.

Play was called at 4 P. M., with the Mutuals at the bat, and Holdsworth leading off with an apparently safe hit to left field; but Glenn got under the ball very handsomely and caught it on the run, amidst loud applause. Start followed with a base-hit, but by Treacy's hit to Spalding he was forced off at second, and Hallinan closed the inning by striking out. Barnes opened play at the bat on behalf of the Whites, but this time Mathews pitched him out on strikes. Hines then tipped out after having a life given him by Hicks, but Anson and McVey got in good grounders for earned bases, and a run looked promising. Peters, however, fouled out, and so the game opened with blanks on both sides. In the second inning Craver led off with a safe hit, but on Hicks' hit to Barnes at right short Craver was touched and Hicks thrown out, Barnes handling the ball in the best style of the art. Booth then gave Anson a chance to throw him out, and a second blank was drawn. The Whites did no better, for though Glenn made a base-hit he was forced off at second. In the third inning the Mutuals popped up easy flies, and retired in regular order. The Whites, however, began to score. Barnes opened with a base-hit, reached second on a high throw by Hicks, the ball being well stopped by Craver; but on Hines' ball to Nichols, which the latter failed to hold, Barnes was touched between second and third, another player fielding the ball Nichols had muffed, thereby cutting off Barnes. Anson then sent a high b.ll to Booth, which he held well, and then McVey made a base-hit, and, with two men on the bases, Peters sent the ball rolling to right field for three bases, thereby sending in Hines' unearned run—he having a life given him—and McVey's earned run. No more were scored, however, as White was thrown out by Hallinan. This left the game 2 to 0 in favor of Chicago on the even third inning, and the betting was now in their favor at large odds, though not exactly warranted from the excellence of the play shown by the Mutuals in nearly every position.

In the fourth inning Start opened with a high foul, which was well caught by White close to the fence. Treacy then hit to Anson, who not only muffed the ball badly, but he threw it out of possible reach by McVey, and on this double error by Treacy reached third safely. Hallinan now hit a long ground ball to the right-field corner for four bases, the boys in the crowd yelling themselves hoarse at the hit, two runs scored and one earned being the result. The next two then retired, leaving the score at 2 to 2, but with the Whites having an inning to spare to recover in; and this they did, through the telling hits of Spalding, Bielaski and Barnes, an earned run being thereby secured by the former, leaving the totals at 3 to 2 in favor of Chicago at the close of the fourth inning. Neither nine added to their scores in the fifth and sixth innings, the pitching on both sides being very effective, and the fielding support up to the highest mark, Nichols and Mathews making good stops of hot balls, and Peters and Barnes making a pretty catch. In the seventh inning the Mutuals drew their sixth blank; but through Barnes' fine base-running and a good hit by McVey—finely fielded by Hallinan—a run was scored by Barnes, the score now standing at 4 to 2 in favor of Chicago, and a victory almost assured; at least the betting men thought that way, for they offered almost any odds for bets, pools selling at 20 to 5 on Chicago. In the eighth inning Schafer, 5th b., and Peters and Barnes making a pretty catch. In the seventh inning the Mutuals drew their sixth blank; but through Barnes' fine base-running and a good hit by McVey—finely fielded by Hallinan—a run was scored by Barnes, the score now standing at 4 to 2 in favor of Chicago, and a victory almost assured; at least the betting men thought that way, for they offered almost any odds for bets, pools selling at 20 to 5 on Chicago. In the eighth inning A MASTERLY PIECE OF STRATEGIC FIELDING was exhibited by Barnes, the result of which was to nip the hopes of the Mutuals in the bud, and save them from rallying for the lead, at least in that inning. The play was as follows: Mathews led off with a ball to Peters, which was well picked up and thrown straight to McVey, but the latter dropped it, and Mathews had a life given him. Nichols then had his base given him on three balls, Mathews thereby walking to second base. Here were two men on the bases, no one out, Holdsworth at the bat, with Start on follow. It was dollars to cents that at least one run would be scored, but Holdsworth gave Bielaski a chance for a catch, and the ball being promptly returned to the outfield and have given Anson his third. On this the Mutuals raised a loud appeal for "judgment on obstructing a fielder," and for some time there was quite a discussion had, each of the fielders presenting his testimony in the case. Fortunately the nines had chosen an umpire in the position who knew his business well, and who had the determination to adhere to his decision when he knew he was right. In the first place, the Mutuals had no business to discuss the question further, after the umpire had rendered his decision, as they knew—or ought to know—that in questions of decisions on running bases the umpire is prohibited by the rules from either reversing his decision or rendering judgment on the testimony of any of the players. Secondly, the allowing the ball to strike him by a base-runner, or any attempt to kick it, must be plainly intentional on his part or the umpire cannot give it out. In this case it was the umpire who was the sole judge of the intention, and the players had no right to testify or say a word after the appeal had been made and the decision rendered. Mr. Daniels would not be deterred from his course by any of the testimony so noisily given, and as he did not think he saw intentional he wisely refused to decide Anson out, and the game then went on. The players resumed their positions and Peters took the bat. Unluckily for the Chicagos, the short-stop this time failed to duplicate his three-baser of the third inning, and, as he hit to Hallinan instead, a chance was given for a double play, and "up went the sponge" as the Mutuals were to the pagoda to dress after their well-earned victory over the strong team from Chicago.

CHICAGO vs. MUTUAL.
The Defeat of the White Stockings.

In April last, in commenting on the strength of the several nines of the League Association, we referred to the fact that, as far as possessing the ability to win games from sheer inherent playing strength, the nine of the Brooklyn Mutuals ranked with the strongest in the arena. The question as to their being successful was simply as to whether they could be induced to work together earnestly and in harmony for the honor of victory and the success of the nine alone. They opened the season well by creditable victories over the Hartfords and Athletics, but shortly afterwards became disabled to the extent of their catcher and pitcher being unable to play up to their mark from injuries each sustained. Since they have got into form again they have regained somewhat of their lost ground, though a new weakness has partially shown itself which was not before suspected. Be that as it may, however, what the nine can do when they exert their skill to the utmost was fully exhibited in their second contest with the noted Chicago team, which took place on Thursday, June 15, on the Union Grounds, Brooklyn, N. Y., in the presence of a still more numerous and respectable assemblage than were gathered on the Tuesday previous. Everything was favorable for a fine exhibition. Both nines were in good form, they were evenly matched in many respects, and the receipts at the gate were encouraging to their efforts to distinguish themselves. Both presented the same teams as on Tuesday, and when the contesting nines took their respective places in the field the large crowd of spectators settled themselves to watch what promised to be a very exciting and close contest.

In the fourth inning Start opened with a high foul, which was well caught by White close to the fence. Treacy then hit to Anson, who not only muffed the ball badly, but he threw it out of possible reach by McVey, and on this double error by Treacy reached third safely. Hallinan now hit a long ground ball to the right-field corner for four bases, the boys in the crowd yelling themselves hoarse at the hit, two runs scored and one earned being the result. The next two then retired, leaving the score at 2 to 2, but with the Whites having an inning to spare to recover in; and this they did, through the telling hits of Spalding, Bielaski and Barnes, an earned run being thereby secured by the former, leaving the totals at 3 to 2 in favor of Chicago at the close of the fourth inning. Neither nine added to their scores in the fifth and sixth innings, the pitching on both sides being very effective, and the fielding support up to the highest mark, Nichols and Mathews making good stops of hot balls, and Peters and Barnes making a pretty catch. In the seventh inning the Mutuals drew their sixth blank; but through Barnes' fine base-running and a good hit by McVey—finely fielded by Hallinan—a run was scored by Barnes, the score now standing at 4 to 2 in favor of Chicago, and a victory almost assured; at least the betting men thought that way, for they offered almost any odds for bets, pools selling at 20 to 5 on Chicago. In the eighth inning A MASTERLY PIECE OF STRATEGIC FIELDING was exhibited by Barnes, the result of which was to nip the hopes of the Mutuals in the bud, and save them from rallying for the lead, at least in that inning. The play was as follows: Mathews led off with a ball to Peters, which was well picked up and thrown straight to McVey, but the latter dropped it, and Mathews had a life given him. Nichols then had his base given him on three balls, Mathews thereby walking to second base. Here were two men on the bases, no one out, Holdsworth at the bat, with Start to follow. It was dollars to cents that at least one run would be scored, but Holdsworth gave Bielaski a chance for a catch, and the ball being promptly returned to the outfield and have given Anson his third. On this the Mutuals raised a loud appeal for "judgment on obstructing a fielder," and for some time there was quite a discussion had, each of the fielders presenting his testimony in the case. Fortunately the nines had chosen an umpire in the position who knew his business well, and who had the determination to adhere to his decision when he knew he was right. In the first place, the Mutuals had no business to discuss the question further, after the umpire had rendered his decision, as they knew—or ought to know—that in questions of decisions on running bases the umpire is prohibited by the rules from either reversing his decision or rendering judgment on the testimony of any of the players. Secondly, the allowing the ball to strike him by a base-runner, or any attempt to kick it, must be plainly intentional on his part or the umpire cannot give it out. In this case it was the umpire who was the sole judge of the intention, and the players had no right to testify or say a word after the appeal had been made and the decision rendered. Mr. Daniels would not be deterred from his course by any of the testimony so noisily given, and as he did not think he saw intentional he wisely refused to decide Anson out, and the game then went on. The players resumed their positions and Peters took the bat. Unluckily for the Chicagos, the short-stop this time failed to duplicate his three-baser of the third inning, and, as he hit to Hallinan instead, a chance was given for a double play, and "up went the sponge" as the Mutuals were to the pagoda to dress after their well-earned victory over the strong team from Chicago.

ST. LOUIS vs. BOSTON.

The championship series between these clubs was opened at Boston, Mass., June 14, after a fashion which thoroughly disgusted the denizens of that city, the game being about the poorest ever witnessed between professional clubs there, and the home team making so miserable an exhibition that they were fourteen runs behind when game was up.

Consequent upon the poor exhibition in the preceding contest, there were few spectators present on the 16th, when a second game was played, in which the home nine, contrary to expectation, proved triumphant, defeating their Western rivals two to one. McBride laid off, Manning taking the pitcher's position, and Josephs going to right field. The fielding on both sides was far from perfect, but the Reds succeeded in batting the home pitcher much better than in the previous game, while the record of base-hits obtained off Manning reached but seven.

HARTFORD vs. LOUISVILLE.

The Louisville Club's turn for a beating by the fine team which is doing so much for the glory of Connecticut, came off on Tuesday, June 18, when they failed to make a single run, though their good fielding served to keep down the score of the conquerors, as witness what follows:

CONFIDENCE vs. MAGIC.

The Confidence B. B. C. of New Rochelle, N. Y., and the Magic of City Island played together at New Rochelle June 15, for a prize of $75 cash, given by the citizens of the towns from which the above clubs hail. The fact that the first game between the above clubs was closely contested drew together over 750 persons, and they departed well satisfied, as it took twelve innings to settle the game, in favor of the Confidence by a score of 3 to 2. Dillon of last year's Confidence nine made his appearance in the Confidence nine for the first time this season, he playing first base, in the place of Manual Dehlman, who also made the winning hit for the Confidence in the twelfth inning. McGuirk made his first on a safe hit, and there were two men out, when Dillon hit a hard ball clean over the right fielder's head, on which McGuirk came home from first and Dillon went to third, where he was left, Bloom struck out. The catching of Cashen was also very fine, he only having two errors charged to him. Oliver's pitching was very good. On the Magic side, the play of Price behind the bat was worthy of praise, as was the pitching of Hoffman. The game was satisfactorily umpired by Thos. W. Stanly of the Active Club of Somerville, Ct. The ball used on the occasion was one made by Ryan & Co., and without rubber.

Post-office (W. Va.)

THERE WERE LETTERS in the Wheeling on June 16 for J. G. Baldwin, and Harry Codona, both of Cook's English Circus.

THE FOLLOWING PROFESSIONALS are notified of letters awaiting them at the Detroit (Mich.) Post-office: D. J. Casey, of Cole's Circus; Geo. W. Hall, circus "biz" (3); M. B. Cowles, of N. O. Minstrels (3); J. W. Cross, of Haigney's Op. Co.; F. S. Wren, of Heeley's Op. House; and John Forepaugh's Circus.

INTRODUCTORY OVERTURE.

MONDAY, June 19, '76.

The Republican Convention at Cincinnati has engrossed general attention since our last, to the detriment of theatricals and nearly everything else, although it must be admitted that very little has been doing in show-business for some time past, outdoor amusements claiming public recognition, even from those who have heretofore failed to see much in our public sports and pastimes, which have assumed enlarged proportions within the past few years. Every day serves to add to the number of managers and performers who annually, about this time, assemble in the metropolis to compare notes, to make engagements, and to discuss the situation generally; but, so far, we hear of no further speculation in theatrical railroad trips between the Atlantic and the Pacific, the financial results of the recent rapid-transit hobby commensurate with the outlay and labor and anxiety of running it through on that line.....Innovations upon established rules of the theatre give us a good deal of uneasiness, because some of them are fraught with considerable danger to manager as well as to audience. Intelligence recently reached us to the effect that a difference of opinion had arisen between a manager and his patrons in Denison, Texas. It appears that, contrary to all etiquette, a number of the spectators in a theatre in that place persisted in standing up, notwithstanding there was other than "standing-room only." The manager, one Michael Langley, Esq., requested them to sit down, but they refused to accede to his mild admonition, and laughed him to scorn. Failing in his peaceful intent, the manager made his exit at the prompt-side, seized a real gun, and again appeared before his audience, with the alleged purpose of boring holes in the refractory ones, and thereby compelling obedience to his behests; but the stage-hands were about to be put down so easily, and when they saw the manager, all armed, and with murder in his soul, the gentle rangers drew a bead on the threatening manager, opened fire along the whole line, and soon the Langley one lay weltering in his gore, a livid corpse. This is painful, and we greatly regret that wiser counsels could not have prevailed and prevented this effusion of blood, this tragedy in real life, upon the very boards whereon had been depicted mimic performances representing the passions of mankind. We allude to this startling affair so that our managers may be put on their guard against imitating the realistic features presented by the Texas manager; for, even though the theatrical habitue hereaway is exceedingly tractable, and ready to accommodate himself to circumstances, nevertheless there are moments when an overt act by a bloodthirsty manager may provoke rebellion, and then, once aroused, the peaceful auditor and his confrères may make it so warm for the indefatigable entrepreneur and his merciless emissaries as to compel their decease in a row of living gore. This state of things should be deplored, and we urgently request that managers will not appear in a hostile attitude, no matter how deep the provocation may be.....A dreadful rumor comes to us from the Western Reservation; and, so astounding is the revelation, that we hesitate to place implicit reliance upon it." This report says that some fiendish manager, with malice for all and charity for none, contemplates making a tour of the Reservations, and presenting to the wondering gaze of the Indians "The Black Crook," in all its pristine beauty. What may be the effect of such a spectacle upon the untutored son of the forest is beyond our calculation; but this much we do fear, and that is that the red man in his enthusiasm may make a raid upon the ballet-girls, carry them away to some sequestered spot, and make squaws of them. This is fearful to contemplate, and it behooves the ladies of the ballet to look before they leap. The rumor, however, lacks confirmation.....Let us turn to more pleasant subjects, one of which is the engagement of G. C. Boniface and his talented daughter at Wood's Museum, where they have given the best of satisfaction, and elicited kindly words of commendation.

ABOUT STELLA.

Boniface is a host in himself,
A player of power and action;
While his daughter, if not the principal star,
Is still a Stella of attraction.

.....A "cruel edict" has gone forth in Munich, and hereafter actors who die on the stage according to the business of the play are forbidden to come in front of the curtain and bow before the close of the play. Well, we cannot see where the cruelty comes in; for certainly it does look queer to see a deceased corpse rise up from where he has just perished in his tracks, and appear in the living flesh before the enthusiastic spectators. Had such an order been issued in this city in the days when Kirby earned an honest living by his nightly dying, the manager would have had his theatre torn down from pit to dome, and himself immolated on the altar of his insane desires. Although the death of Kirby was one of those realistic efforts which turned art into nature, yet what a spell of sadness would have surrounded the Chatham habitues had the deceased omitted to present himself, just as well as ever he was, before his enraptured friends? But Kirby has passed away—died beyond all hope of reawakening in this world—and we mourn his loss. The Munichers had better ponder o'er these things ere they fulminate any more such odd notions as those which would deprive the deceased performer from receiving the plaudits of his admirers before the close of the play.....Joseph Murphy at the Park this week appeared in a play entitled "Kerry Gow." And this reminds us that, though Joseph plays on numerous instruments, we can hardly call him a bona fide "Joe." Ah, ha! "Kerry the news!".....And, talking about our Irish friends, the other day, while we were exercising "Our Jim" on the sunny side of Broadway, and conversing on matters of a Thespian character, we suddenly exclaimed: "There's Pat Rooney in the omnibus." "What of that?" was the immediate response of the young man. "I seen Brougham play it years ago!".....And during this promenade we met many of our prominent actors—among them the comical Stuart Robson—who wondered "where's going," we remarked. "Guess he's goin' to see two men at Sandy's bar," was the reply of "Our Jim." Poetry in honor of STUART R.

Robson has a jolly mood—
Each comedy he increases.
All in all, he's very good,
But best when seen in pieces!

.....Another malicious report is brought to us, to the effect that the certain men who run the bank was broken because the depositors withdrew all the funds to attend the circus. And yet legitimate actors, whatever that may mean, declare that a circus isn't nothing, and that a canvas show can never draw!.....It isn't true that the troupe who recently went to San Francisco in that fast train will be compelled to walk home! And here we may be permitted to remark that, although he is no singer, our favorite Cassius is said to possess a fine Barrett tone!.....It seems somewhat queer that at the Hippodrome, where Sankey electrified the pious people by his conundrum of "What Shall the Harvest Be?" we find the irreligious thirsty ones drinking beer—beer—beer if in search of "a man with capital" wishes to ascertain our views as to the chances of success should he build a first-class star-theatre near the Battery. We don't think favorably of the project, because it would be almost impossible to induce first-class people to go down that far to see the alleged first-class stars. The residents of that immediate vicinity have not been accustomed to seeing stars, if we except our metropolitan police-stars. Twenty-five years ago such a theatre might have attracted fairly, but just now our capitalist friend had better hold on to his effects.....While we were sauntering through the main building of the Centennial exhibition, recently, we observed a comical old fogy who was taking in the many beautiful works of art in the English department. "What are these?" she asked, pointing to some rare ornamental work. "Those, madam," replied the attendant, "are to be sold for a centre-piece!" "Cheap enough—I'll take them." But she didn't. Yet we boast of our civilization, our educational system, and the advancement in the fine arts.....The crops have not yet been raked in, and that is why the circus proprietor sheds bitter tears of disappointment as he looks upon the scattered appearance of the patrons of husbandry who do manage to pay their way inside the folds of the canvas. You would feel very low-spirited indeed if you were a menagerie owner, and beheld the stacks of hay and things the elephants get away with, and witness the tons of animal food the wild beasts crowd out of sight at one fell swoop! Ah, who can tell the feelings of that painstaking manager as he moves from stand to stand, and "fears each bush an officer!" It's all very well to be a visitor at the circus, to see the brilliant cavalcade go circling the course, to hear the music peal on the sunny, balmy air, and to watch the young lady in spangles and tights as she soars upward on the slender cord, and so sweetly looks down upon the rivulet of upturned faces! But oh! could you realize the heartache, the worriment of mind, and the mean ways of the manager as he shirks the clutches of the sheriff, and eludes the allurements of the show-sprinter, you would give up all ides of becoming a show-actor, and be satisfied to remain a coalheaver for the remainder of your existence. Which goes to show that, no matter how humble and lowly our occupation may be, there is a still lower depth to be reached. Yes! yes! .....There is nothing but continuous out-lied, ere yet their presence could be utilized. And now, with bowed head and fevered brow, Coup mourns his loss, and grief has possession of his soul. What is now this earth but a vale of tears for him? We will sling our poetic pen:

SADNESS.

Coup once did make a splendid coup—
And thought his course plain sailing—
Two whales he had for public view,
But Dame Fate took the two,
Still Coup he goes a-wailing!

.....As we flew along th' iron rail during our recent trip with Jarrett & Palmer on the flying train of course we were not there, Jimmy; but who knows the difference? If you would get on in the world, go everywhere—on paper, and pretend to be invited everywhere. Society is artificial to a certain extent, and the false, with some, is better than the true. Do not interrupt us again, Jamos. When we say we have been thus and so, you must believe it to be true, for distance goes a great way in this world. "That's so—when I was up at Sing Sing I seen a good many characters all the way up there"], this happy thought occurred to us just as we went "around the horn"—that the difference between a luxurious railway coach and an indifferent father is, that one's a palace car and the other a cad. Pshaw! "Who's nobody can deny."..... Rumors of war have set us to thinking; and while we are free to admit that "the head of a column" is good for advertisers, it is bad for soldiers. And that's so, too.....Dom Pedro is so delighted with the eccentricities of our song-and-dance men that he contemplates sending some to Brazil for planting there. This also needs confirmation.....On our way back from the Republican convention last week, we were surprised to find how soon the rural rustics learn slang. At every station the Grangers kindly advised us to "pull down our vest." But we had no time to stop to thank them, yet we must stop right here.

CITY SUMMARY.

THE SISTERS PASCAL performed at the Olympic Theatre during the past week in a musical scene, entitled "Les Pompiers de Nanterre," which was much more amusing than the piece in which they made their debut. Their costumes were grotesque, and their singing and acting elicited lavish applause. A good opportunity was afforded them to display their mercuriality of temperament, with which both are lavishly gifted. At the close of the scene they gave a French character dance entitled "The Clodoche," which, although it had been previously witnessed in this country, had all the charms of novelty, owing to the inimitable manner in which it was performed. They responded to two recalls, and the applause was long continued after they had been compelled to leave the stage on account of exhaustion. The success achieved by these artists is pronounced. Miss Anna Morgan sang fresh ballads, Quilter and Goldrich gave the best of their songs-and-dances, and a quartet, by J. R. Thomas, entitled "The Rose of Killarney," was admirably sung by Messrs. Griffin, Holdsworth, Lee, and Merritt. Business fair.

AT THE FIFTH-AVENUE THEATRE, at the matinee on Saturday, "The Serious Family" and "Pocahontas," both cast as on previous representations, constituted the bill. "Pique" was acted at the other performances during the week, to a fair average attendance.

KELLY & LEON'S MINSTRELS did a paying business the past week, and, we are informed, it is the intention of the manager to keep the theatre open during the entire Summer. The same programme was presented during the past week as had been given the previous week, and it gave the various members of the company a good opportunity to display their talents. The burlesque operetta of "Norma," with Leon in the title character and Edwin Kelly as Pollio, created much laughter. Lew Benedict's stump speech was brimming with wit and humor, and was much enjoyed by the spectators. A change of bill this week.

THE BRIDAL FAMILY have commenced a suit in the Marine Court against R. W. Butler, manager of the Globe Theatre, for the recovery of a sum of money due them on account of salary.

M. B. LEAVITT, manager of Mme. Renta's Female Minstrels, arrived in town last week.

MRS. A. F. STEWART has made a number of charitable bequests, and among them she gave on June 13 the sum of $2,500 to the American Dramatic Fund Association.

M. A. WATSON, the secretary of the National Billposters' Association, writes us that the next annual meeting of that society is to be held in this city, commencing July 12, instead of 14, as he previously informed us, and as we stated in our past issue.

GEORGE FRANCE and E. H. Lay and their dogs Bruno and Don Cæsar are to perform this week at both the matinee and evening entertainments in Wood's Museum.

M. B. LEAVITT intends sailing for England in the steamship Egypt on June 24.

THE REMAINS OF THE LATE W. B. CAVANAGH, who died in Enterprise, Fla., on Feb. 2 last, arrived in this city, in the steamship San Jacinto, on June 14, and they were registered in Greenwood Cemetery 15.

BILLY BARRY was the recipient of a benefit at the Globe Theatre on the afternoon and evening of Thursday, June 15, when the majority of the auditorium was severely taxed by his friends and admirers. At the matinee the programme included the sketch of "Pique;" songs, with banjo accompaniment, by Wash Norton; T. M. Hengler as "The Merry Minstrel;" ballads by Miss E. Johnson; Robt. Johnston recited "The Seven Ages of Man;" horizontal-bar performances by Stewart Dare, aided by Tommy Hall as clown; Eugene Blitz's lecture on "Woman's Rights;" Irish songs by John D. Griffin; a double jig by Tierney and Cronin; J. H. Graham in lightning changes; songs by Henrietta Mollenhauer; Dutch songs by Fred Warren; Billy Barry gave his Ethiopian specialties; Ruvardo was seen in an equilibristic act on the high trapeze; and the sketch of "Which is Which?" acted by Tierney, Cronin and Reed, was given for the finale. Walters and Morton, song-and-dance performers, and the three Turner Brothers, in songs, dances, etc., were announced, but failed to appear. At the evening entertainment, the first three acts of the matinee programme were repeated; Henrietta Mollenhauer sang songs; John Sheehan and Bobby Jones made quite a pronounced success in an Irish sketch called "The Life of a Shoemaker, or the Ash-box Inspector;" Eugene Blitz repeated his burlesque lecture; Charles W. Young gave a song-and-dance called "Finn" Mc Carty;" Fred Warren sang Dutch songs; the three Turner Brothers gave their specialty of "Jubilee Days;" John D. Griffin sang Irish songs; Andy McKee and John Hogan gave an original act called "Southern Revels;" Eva West sang songs of the period; Frank A. Gibbons was seen in a dancing trapeze act, and in "A Slide for Life;" Jennie Ward gave her mystic changes, impersonating seven different characters without leaving the stage; a sketch called "A Trip to Paris" introduced Billy Barry, John Allen, George W. Reed and Miss Hannah Birch; Larry Tooley gave his Dutch specialties; and the entertainments concluded with a trial dance for a silver cup, contested for by Harry Donnell, Bobby Fulton, Billy McElroy and Pat Nugent, J. O'Donnell being the winner. Regan and Hart, billed to give Irish songs, did not appear.

AT THE THIRD-AVENUE THEATRE the past week there was an almost entire change of company. Miss Fanny Herring acted at the evening performances in "The French Spy," and at the Wednesday and Saturday matinees in "False Colors, or Who Wins?" The supporting company included E. Byers, G. F. McDonald, Charles Manley, T. J. Nolan, G. Warren, Harry Leslie, John Walsh, T. H. Tryon, J. E. Jones and Miss Nellie Young. Prior to the drama a variety olio was given, which included Commodore Nutt in divers changes; male character songs by Miss Annie Hindle; Miss Ada Laurent in her specialty of "The Mystery, or Dancing as it Was and Is;" banjo songs by George Warren; Gus Lee, Major Nutt and Commodore Nutt in a comical act called "The Little 2 and Big 1;" serio-comic songs by Ida Burt; and the sketches of "The Rascal Detective," "Mr. and Mrs. Finn," introducing Pat Keenan and J. W. McAndrews, not otherwise seen. Business as good as elsewhere in the city.

WARREN RICHARDS, whose real name was Richard A. Warren, died at his residence, No. 219 East Thirty-seventh street, June 15. He was a native of New Orleans, La., and for many years was a popular tenor singer with Duprez & Benedict's Minstrels and other bands. His funeral took place June 16, and his remains were interred in Calvary Cemetery.

R. M. CARROLL and his three sons were the stellar attraction at the Bowery Theatre during the week ending June 17, acting in a specially-prepared sketch written for a vehicle to display their peculiar talents, and hitherto frequently reviewed in these columns, and their variety sketch entitled "The McFaddens." A slight deviation was made in this programme for the Carrolls' benefit on Friday evening. The farce of "A Steamboat Trip" replaced "The McFaddens," and after the drama R. M. Carroll and Johnny Reed-ley contested in dancing for a purse of $500 and the championship of America." The referee, Harry Cunningham, decided the contest a draw, and directed that a second contest should take place in September next. There was a good attendance at the benefit, but during the other nights of the week it was only fair.

WARD, MORTON, Tierney and Cronin, John D. Griffin and Miss Henrietta Mollenhauer were the fresh people seen upon the stage of the Globe Theatre on June 12. Wash Norton sang songs and picked upon the banjo to the satisfaction of his auditors. Tierney and Cronin, whose performances given at another theatre were quite recently reviewed, gave their sketch entitled "When a Man Goes to Play," during which they introduced clever imitations of two young reel-dancers. John D. Griffin, who long ago established himself as a favorite with the patrons of this theatre, sang Irish character songs in both male and female attire, which evoked forcible applause. Miss Mollenhauer sang the basket songs in her repertory contained, which received an endorsement of approval from the audience. The programme also included T. M. Hengler in his entertainment of "The Merry Minstrel," in which he introduced a medley song-and-dance called "Pretty Bertie," and later a new song entitled "Take Care Boys," the period by Miss Eva West; a burlesque lecture on "Woman's Rights" by Eugene Blitz; performances on the horizontal bar by Master Stewart Dare, during which Tommy Hall officiated as clown; and the sketches of "Pique," "The Challenge Dance," and "The Dog of the Old Toll-house," in which George W. Reed, not otherwise seen, took part. Attendance moderately good.

ALFRED H. HASTINGS and wife, nee Miss Emily Baker, arrived June 15 from San Francisco, Cal., where they closed a year's engagement, under Thomas Maguire's management, on May 15. On their journey hither they were detained in Elko, Nev., where Mrs. Hastings presented her husband with a daughter, weighing eight and one-half pounds.

THE UNION-SQUARE THEATRE COMPANY and Miss Sara Jewett, who had been recently engaged, left for Chicago, Ill., on Friday last. They are to perform in Hooley's Theatre for five weeks.

GEORGE C. BONIFACE and Miss Marie Stella acted at Wood's Museum in "Lean Valjean" until Thursday evening, when "La Tour de Nesle" and "Nick of the Woods" were substituted and performed the remainder of the week to pretty fair business. At the matinees the stock company acted in "Lucille."

MUSICAL NOTES.—Mlle. Aimee, supported by MM. Duplan, Darcy, Meziers, Dalbert, Miles. Gueymard, Duparc, Cherry, Vandenhet, and others, gave a season of opera-bouffe at Booth's Theatre during the past week, under the direction of M. Offenbach, "La Vie Parisienne" being presented each evening and at the Saturday matinee. The representations attracted good houses. On the opening night M. Offenbach personally directed the orchestra during the performance of the overture, but left the conducting during the rest of the piece.....Mrs. Thursby, soprano, Messrs. Gottschalk and Oudin, baritones; the Young Apollo Club, Senor Josef White, violinist; W. F. Williams, organist; Geo. W. Colby, pianist; and Mr. Aptommas, harpist, took part in the concert at Chickering Hall on June 12, for aid of the Hospital for the Cure of Consumptives. The concert was under the direction of Mr. Aptommas.....William Candidus the tenor sailed for Europe by the steamship Pommeranis on Thursday last.

ROBERT AND BELLA PATEMAN sailed for Europe in the steamship City of Richmond on June 17.

ROBERT STRUTHERS and Jennie Gourlay arrived from Boston last week. They will pass the Summer in Bath, L. I.

GILMORE'S GARDEN has been well appreciated during the past week by a succession of large audiences, who have had during a portion of the week the attraction of a fruit and flower show, under the auspices of the Horticultural Society, as an extra entertainment to frequent this popular resort. Henry Kowalski the pianist, who has been so favorably received heretofore, will perform during the present week. Since the advent of Bandmaster Gilmore there has been a marked increase in the attendance, a fact without doubt due to the variety offered in the programmes which is enough to suit every taste, and to the effective interpretations given by the band, presenting musical bills of fare that are decidedly enticing. Arbuckle, Levy and Kowalski are the soloists this week.

J. H. MCVICKER of Chicago, Ill., is in town.

AT WOOD'S MUSEUM the programme last week included horizontal-bar exercises by Delavanti, Alfredo and Dohm; Mlle. Bertha and Senor Novissimo in a ballet; banjo playing by Horace Weston; songs by Minnie Hall and Emily Prior; Rose Keene, William Forrester and John Gourlay in operatic specialties; living tableaux; Frank Steele's special act; the sketches of "A Husband's Suspicions," "The Doctor's Shop," and "The Deacon's Mishaps," introducing George Atkins, John Francis, Blanche Elberts, Alice Gerard and others. This week C. A. Loder and Leslie and Sharpley will be added to the company.

THE "TWO HUNDREDTH" performance of "Pique" at the Fifth-avenue Theatre is announced for Friday evening, June 23, and the "one hundred and ninety-fifth" for Monday evening, June 19. If the latter statement is correct, "Pique" cannot be performed for the two hundredth time (Wednesday matinee having been discontinued) until either the matinee or evening performance of Saturday next. However, on Friday the author is to have a benefit, and at the matinee "Divorce" will be the attraction, and in the evening "Pique" will be performed, with nearly the original cast. At each performance, in addition to the plays announced, Sol Smith Russell will give his character impersonations; little Fay Templeton will perform her musical specialties, and Slavin's Georgia Jubilee Singers will be heard in character melodies. Every lady attending the matinee will be presented with a photograph of the "Pique" troupe and a satin programme. Those present at the evening performance will receive a satin programme and a solid silver ticket.

THE WARREN SISTERS will be added to the company at the Third-avenue Theatre this week.

HARRIGAN AND HART are in negotiation for the lease of a theatre on Broadway, and there is a probability of their performing in this city this Summer. Their many friends and admirers will give them a cordial welcome.

THE GLOBE THEATRE closed for the season on June 17. It may possibly reopen on or about July 3.

DRAMATIC.

Centennial Fourth of July.

CORRESPONDENTS are respectfully and urgently requested to mail their letters and reports for the week preceding the FOURTH OF JULY so as to reach here not later than Saturday, July 1, as THE CLIPPER, No. 14, will be published earlier than usual, so as to avoid coming out on our Centennial anniversary, and to give all connected with its publication and distribution an opportunity to participate in the festivities of the nation's Centennial birthday.

MLLE. SOBLKE, a dancer who figured in "The Black Crook" in this city some years ago, is now visiting the Centennial Exhibition in Philadelphia.

J. F. ALLEN, tragedian, publishes his address in another column.

R. H. CARROLL and his sons are at liberty to arrange dates with managers for 1876-77, as dramatic or specialty stars. All applications can be addressed as per card.

J. K. EMMET, who is now fulfilling an engagement at Melbourne, Australia, can be addressed as per advertisement, in which he states that he will play in Sydney, Adelaide, and New Zealand.

ED. MARSH has been engaged for comedy business at the Varieties Theatre, New Orleans, La., for the season of 1876-7.

J. G. STUTTS'S mother died recently in Sandwich, Canada.

FANNY B. PRICE played in Marionette, Wis., June 12, 13, Oconto 14, Appleton 15, Green Bay 16, Watertown 17, supported by Edwin

THE SUMMER SEASON at the Theatre Comique, St. Louis, Mo., under the management of Harry Noxon, is progressing finely. Alice Gilmore, Mlle. Estelle, and the Girards made their first appearance on June 11. Alice Gilmore was handsomely attired in male costume, and did a song-and-dance in good style. Mlle. Estelle is a fine dresser, but her singing was not up to the usual standard of excellence. The Girards—Julian, Emile, and Robert—very easily proved their claim to be the champion tickers, and they made the hit of the week. The cancan was reproduced with a new and splendid wardrobe, and seemed to give great satisfaction. Closing 17: Emerson and Clark, John Le Clair, Murphy and Morton. To open 18: Kelly and Ryan, Waters and Kelly.....At the Adelphi the newcomers were Dan and Flora Mascn, who were loudly applauded for a very neat Dutch sketch; Annie Gibbons, who did a plantation song-and-dance in good style; Alma Southgate, an excellent serio-comic vocalist; Jennie Gibbons, jig-dancer; Weston Brothers, very good banjo-players and vocalists; Wheeler and Gibbons, Dutch song-and-dance; and Charles Harris and Lotta Gray, the latter an excellent singer. The last-named closed after the second night. Annie Fox closed also. Harry Mendell takes a benefit to-night. Barry Maxwell goes to Cincinnati to join Hooley's Minstrels, he having accepted a lengthy engagement with them.....At Leony's are Maude De Lisle, Annie Dolby, Dan Hart, and Ed. Dempster. The latter is stage-manager. Charles Harris and Lotta Gray open 19. Letter dated June 16.

NO NEW ARRIVALS on June 12 at the Theatre Comique, Detroit, Mich., the same company being retained. The event of the week was the benefit of Harry and Fannie Wood on the 10th, when a crowded house greeted them. There were several volunteers who assisted, but whose names were not on the bill. The prizes for the best bootblack and the quickest, best amateur song-and-dance man, and the handsomest and the homeliest man in the audience (the ladies of the Comique company being the judges) afforded great amusement. Closing 17 are the Dalys, William and Blanche, to Jackson; May Hawthorne, Hattie Ellis, the Crawford Brothers, to Chicago. To arrive 19 are Kavanagh Brothers, Emma Lulu, Burton and Woods.....John P. Long, in addition to the company reported last week, has engaged for the Detroit Opera-house 19, 20; Minnie and Maggie Claire, Lou Sanford, Morosco Family, Martinetti Brothers, Fred and Annie McAvoy. Letter of June 17.

THE ADELPHI, Chicago, Ill., was opened on June 12, under the management of Leonard Grover. The following is the list of the company: The Misses Lottie Grant, Ida Heyden, Lizzie Kelsey, Lulu Delmay, Adah Richmond, Ella Hunt, and Messrs. Harry Allen, Thos. Whiffen, the Werner Brothers, Harry Little, Walton the Musical Punch, James Larkin, Carrie Armstrong, Charles Armstrong, Lew Spencer, Edwin Lynch, Charley Benedict, Miss Josephine Leonie, and Mlle. Cora and M. Austin. After the olio, "The Fair One with a Blonde Wig" was presented. Business good.....At the Coliseum on the 12th the Valdis Sisters opened; also Miss Flora McDonald. Closing 17 are Miss Angie Schott, Westers and Kelly, going to St. Louis. Next week the minstrel first part will be resumed. Letter of June 17.

AT THE METROPOLITAN, Indianapolis, Ind., "Baldy Cudney, the Man of the Columbiads," was presented June 12. W. H. Schneider rendered the role of Horace Livingstone with four assumed characters, in his usual excellent style, and was well supported by E. T. Goodrich as Harry Garland, Frank Noyes as Leon Gray, and Miss Frankie Lee as Helen Livingstone. In the olio preceding the drama the Columbine Brothers in their triple clog were recalled several times; Homer and Holly in their laughable act, "The Two Senators," received much applause. The only departure 17 was Harry Clayton, destination unknown. Billed for 19: George and Jennie Beam, Hen Mobley, Billy Wiley, and the educated trick horse Comet. The theatre will close July 5 for the season. Advices of June 15.

AT THE COMIQUE SUMMER THEATRE, Washington, D.C., business was fair during the past week. The new appearances on June 12 were Lillie Linden in serio-comic songs, W. H. Morton in motto songs, Julia Wilson in select ballads, the Richmond Sisters in songs-and-dances, and Den Thompson as Joshua Whitcombe in the burlesta of that name. Mr. Thompson made a decided hit. The departures for June 17 were Frank Cushman, to New York; Lillie Linden, not known; and Den Thompson and Julia Wilson, to Baltimore. The announcements for June 19 are Griffin and Rice, Jennie Wade, Ada Sanborn and Annie Wood. Advices without date.

JOE LANG, Rel Mueab, Harry Williams, Lucy Clifton, the La Verde Sisters, Christine Percy and the Fontainebleaus were the fresh attractions at Shelby's, Buffalo, N.Y., June 12. Geo. Knight's benefit, 16, drew out additional attractions, the benedictory the Henri Family and Lulu Schaeffer appearing. Lucien Marc and W. J. Austin wrestled nightly—Austin winning. Closed 17: Collins and Moore, Christine Percy, Marc and Austin, to New York; the La Verde Sisters, to Chicago, Ill.; Rel Mueab, to St. Louis, Mo. Billed for 19: Minnie Loder, Kitty O'Neil, La Belle Marie, Murphy and Mack, the Clark Bros., D. King and Olymphia.....At the Centennial, Dolly Emerson appeared 12, and is re-engaged. Her abilities as a jig-dancer are fine. Closed 17: Nellie Nelson, to New York; also Nellie Hughes. Billed 19: Emma Clifford and Mlle. Annetta. "Musical Mike" Loveland went to Chicago, opening in the Grand Central 19. Prof. Thos. J. Oldfield, who came to this country under engagement with Barnum in 1843, and who is always the only survivor of the famous Campbell minstrels of 1861 and thereabouts, leads the Centennial orchestra. The Professor has been in the business over 50 years. Letter of June 18.

THE SAN FRANCISCO MINSTRELS opened at Maguire's New Theatre, San Francisco, Cal, June 26. The Fieldings have joined the party, and the Brahams, in consequence of their having recently visited San Francisco, will not accompany the troupe to California, but rejoin it on its return East.

THE ATTENDANCE was large at the Theatre Comique, Providence, R. I., throughout the week ending June 17. The new faces 12 were Jimmy Roche, Sallie Mason, and Robert Ferguson. They were well received in their respective parts and specialities. The departures 17 were Prof. Hartz's clamic whimsey, to Boston. The Winner Sisters and Mabel Pearl are announced for 19. Emma Ross of the Ross Sisters lies quite ill at her boarding-place in this city. Advices of June 18.

AT ZIEGLER'S, Toledo, O., June 12, the new appearances were the Ifferd Sisters, who were well received in their songs and character sketches; (Neil) Conway and Kerrigan, the former doing some very fine reel and jig dancing, while Kerrigan played the accompaniments upon the bagpipes; and Dixon and Udell, who did very fair songs-and-dances. They have been on the stage three weeks only, but did fair to reach the upper round of the ladder. Ole Allerup and Brother, leaders of the orchestra, close to-night, going to New York. Gus Gebert and orchestra will fill the vacancy. Conway and Kerrigan, Lettie Carle, May Antonio, and Dixon and Udell, to Cleveland; Sanyeahs—Samuel and Maud—to New York, also close. Opening June 19: Lulu Francis, Annie Fox, Billy and Maggie Ray, Dave McCoy, Willis Sisters, Kate Harvey, Lizzie Johnson and Frank Percey. Biz good.....At the Comique Erba Robeson was the new arrival June 12. The company is composed of Lou Sanford, Lizzie Harmon, Harry Spriggs, Geo. White, W. A. Brooks, Yankee Miller, and Erba Robeson. It has been run on the commonwealth principle during the week. Departures: Harmon and Spriggs, to Chicago. Letter of June 17.

THE GARRETTA TROUPE, consisting of Mlle. Garretta, Young Apollo, Little Valentine and Ed. Monta, sailed for Europe from Philadelphia, Pa., in the steamship Illinois, on June 15.

THE WESTON SISTERS, who are now engaged at the Pavilion, London, Eng., are thus noticed by The Era of May 21:

"The sisters Weston, whom we have repeatedly found opportunity to praise, meet with favor in their American duets and dances, their pretty faces, handsome figures, and graceful movements winning the hearts of all who see them.

FOREIGN SHOW NEWS.

DRAMATIC.

THE LINGARDS, at the Theatre Royal, Melbourne, Australia, were meeting with success. "Our Boys" was withdrawn after a run of six weeks, ending April 29. "Married in Haste," with W. Horace Lingard as Gibson Greene, and Alice Dunning (Lingard) as Ethel Grainger, was produced May 1.....At the Opera-house J. K. Emmet began on May 1 the seventh week of the successful run of "Fritz."

THE GRAND WEKATLEIGH successfully produced "The Shaughraun" at Adelaide, South Australia, on April 14. He expected to sail for the United States in June.

JOHN READHAM, for many years one of the company at the Victoria Theatre, London, Eng., died May 26, aged 64.

A SOMEWHAT DISGRACEFUL SCENE was witnessed in the Blackburn, Eng., Theatre Royal, May 27, when Mr. and Mrs. Bandmann, with their company, were announced to appear for the last time under their engagement. There had been only small attendance during the week, and on this night there was no improvement. Evidently disappointed with his reception in Blackburn, Mr. Bandmann absolutely declined to take part in the performance on that evening. His place, however, in "The Lady of Lyons" was ably supplied by another member of the company, though there were several interruptions during its performance, the audience calling for Mr. Bandmann to complete his engagement. The indignation of the audience happily did not get beyond the limits of forbearance until the end of the piece, when it was announced that, in consequence of the disaffection proceed in the company by the conduct of Mr. Bandmann, "The Duke's Motto" could not be played, and the night's proceedings must be closed. The audience became exasperated, and some fifty or sixty persons made their way behind the stage, and demanded, in a somewhat rough and clamorous manner, the money back which they had paid for admission. This was declined, but in order to restore peace and quietness they were told that a further play would be given if they would retire to their places in the theatre. Their anger was thus appeased, and "The Ticket-of-leave Man" was given with some difficulty, some of the performers being almost entirely unacquainted with the roles they assumed, and a ludicrous aspect was presented by one or two of them reading their parts.

SOPHIE CHEVALIER began a three weeks' engagement at the Prince's Theatre, Manchester, Eng., May 29.

SUMMER WEATHER has caused a downfall in receipts at the places of indoor amusement in the French capital. The Opera Comique and Bouffes Parisiens have closed.

MLLE. BLANCHE BARETTA and M. Barre have been added to the list of sociétaires of the Comedie Francaise, Paris.

EUDORE SOULIE, father-in-law of Victorien Sardou, and librarian at the Palace of Versailles, France, died recently.

DEJAZET'S and Frederick Lemaitre's dresses and theatrical properties were recently sold by auction in Paris, but the sale excited little interest and the prices realized were low.

MME. CATHERINE FARRE, who as Miss Barry was, many years ago an esteemed London actress, died at her residence, Croydon, from an attack of rheumatism, May 27, aged 78. She made her first appearance on the stage, at five years of age, at the Haymarket Theatre, and retired upon her marriage with Mr. Feist. She had survived her eight sons, the death of Harry M. Feist, the "Hotspur" of The Sporting Life and Telegraph, occurring about two years ago.

MISS NELSON closed her engagement at the Haymarket Theatre, London, June 2, having appeared throughout the week as Pauline in "The Lady of Lyons."

MUSICAL.

MLLE. MARGUERITE CHAPSY will, it is stated, be married to a French artillery officer upon the conclusion of her engagement in London, Eng., and will then retire from the operatic boards.

MLLE. HEILBRON, who was to have appeared in Paris with Capoul in the creation of "Paul et Virginie," Victor Masse's new opera, has canceled her engagement with M. Vizentini, paying a fine of 21,000 francs. Golden offers from St. Petersburg, Russia, tempted the gifted cantatrice to take this step.

VARIETY HALLS.

THE GLOBE COMIQUE HALL, one of the oldest hostelries in Bristol, Eng., and which was for some years carried on by Ernee Clark, was burned May 23, property valued at £10,000 being destroyed.

MISS ELLA WESNER is one of the chief attractions at the Cambridge, Sun, and Collins' Music Halls, London, the Misses Weston also appearing nightly at the two latter places.

PAT CADDI the vocalist was at last advices lying hopelessly ill in London.

HARRY FOX, long connected with the Middlesex Music Hall, London, died May 2, from an attack of bronchitis.

JOHN J. NEWBY, a member of Andy Merilles' Christy Troupe, died at Bacup, Lancashire, Eng., May 26, aged 23.

NEGRO MINSTRELSY.

T. D. PENNER, stage-manager of Sam Hague's Minstrels, Liverpool, Eng., and Miss Rachel Joseph were united in the bonds of matrimony in Liverpool, June 7.

MISCELLANEOUS.

E. P. HINGSTON died in London, Eng., June 9. He was about 50 years of age, and was born, we believe, in Yorkshire. His early life was passed in a chemist's shop. When quite young he worked his way to London, and originated a scheme, which has since been widely imitated. He advertised that if any one would send him a lock of hair and a fee he would tell the disease from which the sender was suffering and prescribe a remedy. The business prospered, and Hingston coined money. Then he commenced lecturing upon the subject, and gained much notoriety. At length the police suppressed his business, and after that he wrote stories for some of the minor newspapers, which were sold in numbers. Then he drifted into the show business. His first success in that line was made in London with the Aztec Children, whom he threw into the wake up and lecture upon. He attracted the attention of the late John Henry Anderson, the Wizard of the North, who engaged him to manage the outside business of the wizard's entertainments. Hingston accompanied Anderson on a tour around the world, and while in Australia he became acquainted with Messrs. Spiers & Pond, now the famous railroad caterers in England. Anderson took the management of the Winter Garden Theatre in this city, and lost a great deal of money. He had already for England and Hingston remained here, afterwards accompanying Artemas Ward on his tour to California; and after their return to New York, Hingston managed the business of Heller the magician. He accompanied Artemas Ward to England, and remained with him the first time of his death. He then entered the employ of Spiers & Pond, and managed all their newspaper business, and at the same time continued to dabble in the show business. He gave concerts in the Music Hall by dozens during the Summer, and had done business for Bateman, Bandmann, and others, at the same time negotiating engagements for actors in Australia and America. He managed the Opera Comique for a time, and when last heard from, the subterranean theatre built by Spiers & Pond, was first opened, he was the manager. He was also acting-manager of the St. James Theatre, under Mrs. John Wood's management. A short time ago the Savage Club gave him a grand combination benefit in Drury Lane Theatre, which yielded a handsome sum of money. He left a wife and two children; but how well they are provided for we cannot say, for Mr. Hingston was ever so reticent upon his private affairs that no one knew whether he was rich or poor.

MRS. KNIGHT (formerly Mrs. Ellen Manton), musical glass-performer, harpist and pianist, died suddenly of paralytic stroke, at Barnsley, Eng., April 30.

AQUATICS.

THE SEAWANHAKA'S OCEAN SCHOONER RACE.

Of the two yachting events which occurred in this vicinity on Tuesday, June 13, the most important was the Union Ocean Race between schooners belonging to the Brooklyn, Atlantic, New York, Boston, Eastern and Seawanhaka Clubs, for prizes offered by the Seawanhaka Club, and which, from the fact that it belongs the credit of introducing Corinthian racing in our waters. The conditions required that each boat should be sailed by its owner or by some member of the club to which it belonged, and the course was to start from Sandy Hook, at the point of Sandy Hook, twenty miles to windward, and return. There was nothing wanting in the matter of wind and weather to make the day perfect for the sport, especially under such conditions as governed the contest. The competing boats were as under:

FIRST-CLASS.

	Owner.	Allowance.
Rambler	J. R. Thomas	11m. 10s.
Dreadnaught	A. Cass Canfield	8 35
Palmer	R. Stuyvesant	5 40
Idler	S. J. Colgate	2 40

SECOND-CLASS.

Estelle	J. D. Smith	2 27
Meta	W. E. Iselin	8 16
Ariel	W. L. Swan	8 56
Peerless	Alfred Brown, jr.	9 12

With the sea quite smooth, the sky clear, and the wind tolerably fresh from south-southeast, the gun which gave the signal for the racers to be off was fired at 11.04 A. M., the vessels being first to cross the line, at 11.08:12, followed in order by the Meta, Peerless, Rambler, Palmer, Idler and Dreadnaught, the last-named not getting over until 3 minutes and 25 seconds after the expiration of the fifteen minutes allowed. The run down to the outer buoy, the Dreadnaught, Palmer and Estelle with main clubtopsails hoisted, while the others carried working topsails. The Palmer was not long in assuming the foremost position, which she held all the way out, reaching the buoy with plenty to spare, while the Dreadnaught had headed all the others. The turn was made as follows:

Palmer	3h.	30m.	08s.
Dreadnaught	3	46	19
Idler	3	59	42
Rambler	4	00	50
Peerless	4h.	07m.	42s.
Estelle	4	08	39
Meta	4	21	45
Ariel			not timed

From a dead beat going out, they now had the wind aft, and with all the yachts close-hauled toward the goal at gradually accelerated speed. During the run the Dreadnaught gained some distance on the Palmer—the best handled of any in the squadron—but could not overhaul her, no alteration in the respective position of the contestants occurring, and the order and time of arrival being as under:

FIRST-CLASS.

Start.	Finish.	Act. Time.	Corrected time by allow.
Rambler..... 11.13:56	7.27:56	8.14:00	8.25:10
Dreadnaught..... 11.19:00	6.44:05	7.25:43	7.34:18
Palmer..... 11.14:04	6.36:42	7.09:38	7.09:38
Idler..... 11.18:19	6.46:54	7.28:40	7.31:20

SECOND-CLASS.

Estelle..... 11.08:39	7.22:39	8.20:23	8.17:56
Meta..... 11.09:54	7.43:44	8.33:50	8.25:34
Ariel..... 11.16:08	8.24:30	9.06:27	8.59:51
Peerless..... 11.13:49	7.56:43	8.16:54	8.01:42

By the above table the Palmer wins the first prize for first-class boats, and the Idler the second; but a notice received from the regatta committee informs us that the award to the latter boat was premature, and was owing to a mistake in noting her time at the finish. They give the prize to the Dreadnaught, which beat the Idler 2min. 2sec. The Peerless won the first prize in the second-class, and the Estelle the second.

WILLIAMSBURG YACHT CLUB REGATTA.

Everything favored the members of the Long Island Club on the occasion of their annual regatta, held on the East River, on Friday, June 16, when there were fifteen entries in the four classes, and with the exception of the Inspector, which capsized opposite Ward's Island, and the Cliffie, which withdrew from the contest, the little vessels rounded the Stepping Stones buoy and started homeward in the order shown below:

Pluck & Luck	12h.	35m.	00s.
Mary Gibson	12	37	00
Artful Dodger	12	37	30
Nettie	12	40	00

The time of the remaining yachts was not taken. The Pluck and Luck wins the club pennant for making the best time over the course. She also wins the prize in her class. The Favorita wins the cabin-sloop prize, the Greenpoint the first-class open-sloop prize, and the Mary Gibson the third-class sloop prize.

THE BOSTON REGATTA.—We have received the programme for this event, and, barring that the first prize for Whitehall boats is $75 instead of $100, it is substantially the same as given in our past issue: All entries are free, and may be made personally, or by letter, at W. H. Lee's office, City Hall, until Monday, July 3, at 3 P. M. No distinction will be made between shells and skulls. The Whitehall rowing boats shall not be less than 17 nor more than 20 feet long; width not less than 48; depth not less than 18in.; weight not less than 275lb, the boats to be rowed on the gunwale, to two oars, with double sculls. The four-oared working-boats shall be open and rowed on the gunwale. The drawing for positions will take place at the Committee-room, City Hall, July 3, at 8 o'clock P. M., at which time each person or crew entered for the race will have some authorized representative present to draw, or take such place in the race as may be drawn by the judges. At 7.45 A. M. a gun will be fired, announcing the opening of the regatta. At 8 o'clock a gun will be fired for the boats entered for the first race to come into position, and they will start at the word "Go." The other races will take place in regular order. Any boat not in line ten minutes after the gun is fired will be barred from the race. Committee on regatta—John T. Clark, chairman; Francis Thompson, J. Q. A. Brackett and Wm. G. Russell, secretary. P. Loring, chairman; Wm. J. Flynn, John W. Fraser, Wendell Goodwin, and Daniel Lovering Jr.

A YACHT RACE, for $25 a side, came off over a twenty-mile course, starting from and returning to Henderson's wharf, at Baltimore, Md., on June 12, the competing yachts being Capt. P. Goodhand's Lady of the Lake and Capt. C. Mason's Sallie Mitchell. The former won in 5 hours 45 minutes, coming in ten minutes in advance. They are both 17-foot boats.

THE LACHINE (CANADA) BOATING CLUB elected the following officers June 9: Thomas A. Darwa, president; Alfred Brown, vice-president; E. J. Hughes, secretary and treasurer; committee—Messrs. Benjamin, Dawes, Murray, Kinnear, Beaufield, Chantelloup, Whitney, McLea, Joy, Coffin, S. Ross and R. Ross. Their annual regatta will be held about the middle of August.

HARLEM ASSOCIATION REGATTA.

This annual event, the fourth which has been held since the organization of the Association, came off on the Harlem River on Saturday afternoon, June 17; and though the management of the affair was, as upon former occasions, susceptible of improvement, in the matter of attendance and racing it was a success, albeit the honors were far from equally divided, the Atalantas, who recently rejoined the Association, carrying everything before them in the four races for which they entered, leaving only the six-oared gig prize as a reward for the efforts of the oarsmen representing rival clubs. The regatta attracted enough people to uncomfortably crowd the barge and steamer moored at Florence's dock—the finish of the mile straight-away course—while lumbers were gathered upon the shore opposite the starting-point, at Gates' lumber dock, and craft of all kinds swarmed upon the stream. A return of the racing will be found below, the stations occupied by the crews numbering from the New York shore:

JUNIOR SCULLS—FIRST HEAT.

Station 1. H. W. Rodgers, Atalanta B. C.	1
2. William Robinson, Nassau	2
3. D. W. Herron, Nautilus	3

Time, 6m. 33½s.

With the water comparatively broken by a cross wind, and the tide in their favor, the contestants were sent evenly away shortly after two o'clock, and for about half the distance a pretty race was witnessed, but here the stalwart Atalanta sculler clinched and began to go away from his fellows, whom he soon had where he wanted them, winning, with lots in hand, by five and a half seconds.

PAIR-OARED RACE.

Ladies' Challenge Plate, value $400, and two presentation medals.

2. Harlem, W. H. Downs, J. K. Rustis (stroke)	1
3. Nautilus, David Rooke, William Walsh (stroke)	2
1. Athletic, W. L. Stow, E. L. Newton (stroke)	3

Time, 6m. 53½s.

The Atalantas were given a little the best of the send-off, but the companionship of the trio for nearly a half mile was close enough to make the race interesting to look at, the point being passed with the Atalantas, who were rowing within themselves, still in the lead, closely pursued by the Nautilus four, with the Athletics very much their hold, in the rear. Shortly afterwards Rooke injured the prospects of the Nautilus by bad steering, and his opponents easily assisting a crab made matters still worse, and enabled the Athletics to come up. Recovering quickly, however, they set to work with a will to overhaul the Atalanta men, but were not equal to the task, the latter couple completing the mile, a distance of nearly two lengths in advance, the Athletics being nearly a minute behind the second boat.

JUNIOR SCULLS—SECOND HEAT.

4. E. Mills Jr., Atalanta	1
1. J. D. Foot, Nassau	2
3. Thos. Scanlon, Nautilus	3
2. Waldo Sprague, Athletic	0

Time, 6m. 29¾s.

This turned out an easy thing for the first-mentioned, though in order to make the contest seem more equal, and consequently more interesting, he reserved his powers until the race was half rowed, the boats having been nearly abreast up to that point. He won, with something to spare in steam, by five and a quarter seconds, Foote leading Mills nearly nine seconds. Referee, R. S. Bussing Jr. of the Nereid Club of Brooklyn. Timekeeper, Alden S. Swan. Great dissatisfaction was expressed with the decisions of the referee, who officiated for the first time in that important capacity, and who would not be accepted in the future if he office he voluntarily saddled himself with duties which he was not qualified to discharge properly. Those who had the misfortune to witness his performance unite in no small degree in being able to secure much talent. Then the Ladies in their double clog and jig have redraced dancing down to a science—they must be seen to be appreciated. Then, again, there are Kate and Crowell, who went to play the match at London I expected the rules of quoiting to be carried out with fairness to each contestant; but I found to my surprise that Graham took all the advantage he could, and although he observed the rules which he knew to be entirely unknown to the quoiting world of playing at right and left angles from the hub, in some cases as far distant as 20 or 30 feet from the centre, as the articles of agreement which I signed, the whole of the money received at the gate was to be equally divided between the players. The money taken at the gate and grand stand amounted to £126, or about $615. Out of this amount I received only £21, or about $105. I think Graham may reasonably pay his own expenses out of the extra share of that gate-money. I will not be surprised if I am not backed by Thos. C. Butler and M. J. Ahearn, the course, as in all the races, being the usual two-miler, with a turn. Butler got off second best at the start, but soon got to the front, to the turning stake he doubled the distance, but afterward Tom got into difficulties in the lumpy water, and Ahearn drew away from him, Butler, however, got around a few feet in advance, and from here to the end a very pretty race was witnessed, Ahearn at one time getting the lead by a foot, from the finish, on account, and pennant finally beaten a couple of lengths; time, 16:25. The next race was for the amateur sculling championship of the club, and was rowed by F. Jones, F. Schaefer, T. F. Hegner and P. T. Brophy. Hegner secured the advantage at the start, and for more than a quarter of a mile retained it, but then Butler took the lead, and, going rapidly away, rounded the stake three lengths to the fore, finally winning by two lengths from Shea, who had rowed down Hegner not long after making the turn. Time, 16:00.

Fair-oared working-boats were used in the third contest, which had three starters, viz., W. Cheever, Frank Downing, stroke; D. J. Collins, W. A. Regan, stroke; Frank Hill, J. Shea, stroke. Between the last-named couple were first off, and by the hardest kind of work kept there until the second half-mile had been entered upon, when they had to accept defeat, position, like the race, being changed and partner. Shortly afterwards Hatch and Hill lost about five lengths by stopping to change places, letting Regan and Downing by. Thus they rowed to the end of the Downing pair winning with the greatest ease by ten seconds. Time,

This popular and successful theatre will inaugurate the ninth regular dramatic season under the present Manager
MONDAY EVENING, SEPT. 4, 1876.*

MACAULEY'S THEATRE,
LOUISVILLE, KY.,
will begin the fourth regular dramatic season
MONDAY EVENING SEPT. 11, 1876.
Owing to the great number of Dramatic and other Combinations preparing tours through the country the coming season, BUT ONE DRAMATIC COMPANY has been engaged for the two cities, thus affording an extra number of dates in both theatres FOR COMBINATIONS, DRAMATIC, OPERATIC, PANTOMIMIC, VARIETY, MINSTREL AND OTHER FIRST-CLASS ENTERTAINMENTS. The Dramatic Company and production of plays shall fully equal, if not excel, the standard of excellence upon which the prosperity of these theatres is based. Many of the strongest attractions are already secured, and negotiations are pending with others. Stars or Combinations wanting time, at either of the above theatres, will please address
10-4f B. MACAULEY, Louisville, Ky.

GRIMALDI ADAMS'
ROYAL HUMPTY DUMPTY
PANTOMIME COMPANY,

under the management of JOSEPH A. GULICK. Having received numerous applications from managers of halls throughout the country, I desire to respectfully state that I have no vacant dates for the above company before March 1, 1877, after which time I shall be pleased to arrange.

As I understand that some unprincipled parties with a Chicago "fly-by-night" pantomime troupe have been advertising themselves during the past two weeks throughout Northern Illinois as GRIMALDI ADAMS' HUMPTY DUMPTY TROUPE, I would state that Mr. Adams has, has never been in any way connected with such parties, who are unworthy of confidence and patronage. He is not, nor will he be, connected with any pantomime company except the above troupe, which will take the road NOVEMBER 1, 1876, under the title of GRIMALDI ADAMS' ROYAL HUMPTY DUMPTY TROUPE.

The wonderful little European stars,

VENUS AND ADONIS

who were two years with G. L. Fox's Humpty Dumpty Troupe, and now with W. W. Cole's Hippodrome, have been expressly engaged for a period of two years to accompany MR. ADAMS.
They can be addressed to my care as below.
For full list of artists engaged see future announcements.
